THE

OF

OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST.

INTRODUCTION.

THE church, from the earliest antiquity, has called this part of Scripture on which we now enter, 'The New Testament,' or 'The New Covenant:' for the word (διαθηκη) may be translated either way, as it signifies sometimes a stipulation between two or more contracting parties; at others, the absolute appointment of a person, in those matters that are entirely at his own disposal; and more rarely, a last Will and Testament, by which a man appoints his heirs, and the way in which the inheritance is to be obtained and enjoyed. (Note, Heb. 9:15—17.) It is called, 'The New Testament,' in contradistinction to 'the Old Testament:' not as if the one contained only the old covenant of works, and the other the new covenant of grace; for the contrary has already been abundantly shown: but because the New Testament gives an account of the abrogation of the old dispensation, and of the introduction of a new and better dispensation. The Mosaic law, the national covenant made with Israel, and the Levitical priesthood, formed, as it were, an edition both of the covenant of works, and of the covenant of grace: (Note, Ex. 19:5.) but at the coming of Christ, the end being answered, this was antiquated and abrogated; and the Christian dispensation, containing clearer light and greater encouragement, not attended with burdensome ceremonies, or clouded by types and shadows, or restricted to any place or nation, formed a new edition of the covenant of grace; yet so that unbelievers continue, as of old, under "the ministration of death," the covenant of works. This dispensation, therefore, is compendiously called 'The New Covenant,' or 'The New Testament,' with reference to the death of Christ, the Mediator.

The history, contained in this part of Scripture, is an exact counterpart of the prophecies, promises, and types of the Old Testament, in respect of its grand subject, the great Redeemer, and his kingdom, and salvation. An enlightened student of the Old Testament before the coming of Christ, must have expected exactly such events, and such changes in the outward state of the church, as the New Testament records: and the sole reason why the Jews in general, and the apostles in particular, for a time, did not expect such events and changes, is this: "their understandings were not open to understand the Scriptures." A careful and constant examination of the sacred volume, diligently comparing one part with another, renders this clear and manifest: insomuch that it is possible, and perhaps not very difficult, to form a connected narrative of all the grand outlines of the history, contained in the New Testament, from the very words of the Old Testament. The person of the Redeemer as Emmanuel, his descent in human nature from Judah, and from David when the family was reduced to poverty and obscurity; his miraculous conception, his birth at Bethlehem, his character, miracles, and doctrine; the reception given him by his countrymen, the unparalleled contempt and enmity shown him; the manner and all the circumstances of his death and burial, even to minute particulars; the end and design of his sufferings and death, his resurrection, ascension, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, the conversion of vast multitudes, the obstinate unbelief and opposition of the Jewish nation, the tremendous judgments of God on them for these crimes; the abrogation of the ceremonial law, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the calling of the Gentiles, the glorious triumphs of Christianity, and indeed the state of the church through all intervening ages, till the consummation of all things, might be related in the words of the prophets, only by substituting in a few instances the past for the future tense. To so astonishing a degree do the two divisions of the sacred Scriptures confirm and illustrate each other! And let it here be observed in general, that the writers of the New Testament always quote and refer to the several books of the Old, as divinely inspired, as "the oracles of God," as "the Scripture that cannot be broken;" and never as if they supposed any part of it to be the words of uninspired men, however eminent and excellent. But the New Testament does not rest its claim, to be received as a divine revelation, on the Old Testament, and the evidences by which it is confirmed. While Christ and his apostles appealed to the ancient scriptures, and showed "that thus it was written, and thus it must be;" they confirmed their instructions, and combated the prejudices of their hearers, by the most undeniable miracles, wrought in the open face of day, before great multitudes of all characters, and challenging the investigation of the most powerful, sagacious, and inveterate of their enemies. Indeed it is utterly inconceivable, that Christianity could have made its way in the world, by the obscure persons who propagated it, and against the immense opposition made to it, except it had been thus confirmed, beyond the possibility of any denial.

The prophecies, also, of our Lord and of his apostles, interspersed, as we shall see, through the books of the several writers of the New Testament, and fulfilled through all succeeding ages, form a demonstration of its divine authority, which gathers clearness and energy by revolving centuries. A variety of other proofs, external and internal, might be mentioned: but these hints may here suffice to show, that the New Testament stands on its own basis: and not merely on the ground of the Old Testament, as some have assumed.

The writers of the New Testament speak of themselves, and of each other, as divinely inspired. (Rom. 10:14—17. 16:25,26 1 Cor. 1:21. 2:7,10. 7:40. Eph. 3:3—5. 1 Thes. 2:13. 2 Pet. 3:15,16. 1 John 4:6.)—If, then, any person should be inclined to think, that, provided they be regarded as wise and good men, it is not so absolutely necessary to vindicate their divine inspiration; let them first consider, whether laying a groundless claim to divine inspiration, be not such an impeachment of any writer's probity and veracity, as to render him unworthy of credit in all other things?—And again, if the writers of the New Testament were not divinely inspired, where is our standard of faith and practice? How can we know what the doctrine of Christ was? How shall we distinguish it from all false doctrine?

The several books, which now form the New Testament, were early received by the Christian church, as of divine authority. The greatest part of them are quoted by the most ancient Christian writers, and appealed to as the standard of truth. A large proportion of the New Testament might be collected from writers who lived in the first two centuries. They formed catalogues of the several books, and wrote comments on them; both the orthodox and the heretical appealed to them; lectures on several parts of them are still extant; nay, the enemies of Christianity uniformly mention them, as the authentic books of Christians. So that there is the most complete proof, that all the books now collected in the New Testament were received and read in the assemblies of Christians, before the end of the second century; except the epistle to the Hebrews, that of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, that of Jude, and the Revelation of John; and that these, or most of them, were extant and well known, though not universally received as divinely inspired.—Some reasons may be given, why the Christian church hesitated respecting these books, when they come under our consideration: but this only proves that the persons concerned were cautious, even to an extreme, and therefore not likely to be imposed on by spurious productions.

'From the same tradition we, with the strongest evidence of reason, may conclude, that these ... Scriptures ... were handed down ... uncorrupted in the substantials of faith and manners. .. These records being once so generally dispersed through all Christian churches, though at a great distance from each other, from the beginning of the second century; ... so universally acknowledged ... by men of curious parts, and different persuasions; ... being multiplied into divers versions, almost from the beginning; ... being so constantly rehearsed in their assemblies; ... so diligently read by Christians, and so riveted in their memories, that Eusebius mentions some who had them all by heart; ... and lastly, so frequent in their writings, ... as now we have them; it must be certain from these considerations, that they were handed down to succeeding generations pure and uncorrupt.' Whitby.

As the notion is very common, that we cannot be sure, concerning the correctness of the Scriptures at present, after so many centuries; especially as learned men are frequently speaking of the different readings, found in manuscripts or versions; in addition to the above important quotation, the following remark may afford some satisfaction. During nearly two hundred years, our present translation of the Scriptures has been extant, and persons of various descriptions have made new translations of the whole, or of particular parts; and scarcely any writer on these subjects fails to mention, in one way or other, alterations which he supposes would be improvements. It may then be asked, how can unlearned persons know that our translation may be depended on, as in general faithful and correct? Let the inquirer, however, remember, that episcopalians, presbyterians, and independents, baptists and pædo-baptists Calvinists, and Arminians; persons who maintain eager controversies with each other in various ways, all appeal to the same version and in no matters of consequence object to it. This demonstrates that the translation on the whole is just; and also that it is impossible for any party covertly to deviate from it, while so many eager opponents are incessantly watching over one another. The same consideration proves the impossibility of the primitive Christians corrupting the sacred records; while heretics, Jews, and pagans, stood ready to expose with virulence every deviation; nay, other churches would have protested against the alterations which any particular church attempted to make.—In fact, if all the different readings, (most of which are of little authority) were, without exception, adopted as far as this would be practicable, the rule of truth and duty would remain entirely the same: so that this is merely an artifice, by which the enemies of the gospel perplex the minds of those who cannot, or will not, examine the subject.—'Who can imagine that God, who sent his Son ... to declare this doctrine, and his apostles, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit to indite and speak it, and by so many miracles confirmed it to the world, should suffer any wicked persons to corrupt and alter any of those terms on which the happiness of mankind depended? ... It is absurd to say that God repented of his good will and kindness to mankind, in vouchsafing the gospel to them; or that he so far maligned the good of future generations, that he suffered wicked men to rob them of all the good intended to them by this declaration of his will!' Whitby. (Note, Prov. 22:12.)

It should also be observed, that no other books were received by the primitive church, as a part of divine revelation. Very many other compositions were sent forth, bearing the names of the apostles or primitive teachers; but, on careful examination, all, except those which now form the New Testament, were rejected as spurious. And this shows with how scrupulous caution the canon of Scripture was fixed. The four gospels were very early received, as the writings of the evangelists whose names they bear. They are mentioned distinctly by the fathers of the second century, as books well known by the name of gospels, and as such were read by Christians, at their assemblies every Lord's day.—Several other gospels were published, and some gained a temporary credit; but they are either not mentioned in the approved writings of the primitive Christians, or mentioned with disapprobation.

It is well known that the word Gospel signifies glad tidings: 'God-spel, or God's good tidings, Dr. Johnson:) and the original word has precisely the same meaning. The inspired writers of those histories, which we call "The Gospels," give distinct views of those things which relate to the birth, life, miracles, discourses, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension, of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; connected with some account of his forerunner, John the Baptist, and of his apostles and primitive disciples. Their accounts, as might have been previously supposed, vary from one another; each of them recorded more fully those particulars which most suited his purpose, or which had most affected his mind: for the most complete superintending inspiration did not supersede the use of the writer's memory, judgment, and understanding; but rather served to assist, direct, and exalt it. And thus, while these variations show that they did not write in concert, (for in that case, the appearance of disagreement would certainly have been avoided;) they tend to corroborate the evidence of the divine authority of their histories: as their actual coincidence, and the easy manner in which their apparent variations may be reconciled, form a strong presumptive proof that they were under a supernatural guidance, and cannot satisfactorily be accounted for in any other way.—'Industry, ingenuity, and malice, have, for ages been employed in endeavouring to prove the evangelists inconsistent with each other; yet not a single contradiction has hitherto been proved on them. ... But one thing is fact. These four men ... have done, without appearing to have intended it, what was never performed by any authors before or since. They have drawn a perfect human character, without a single flaw. They have given the history of one, whose spirit, words, and actions were, in every particular, exactly what they ought to have been: who always did the very thing that was proper, and in the best manner imaginable: who never once deviated from the most consummate wisdom and ... excellency, and who, in no instance, let one virtue ... entrench on another, but exercised all in perfect harmony and exact proportion. ... This subject challenges investigation, and sets infidelity at defiance. Either these men exceeded in genius and capacity all the writers who ever lived, or they wrote under the special guidance of divine inspiration.' Answer to Paine's Age of Reason, by the Author.

N. B.—Whatever notice may be taken in this edition, of a critical nature, with relation to the original Greek words, or to the Septuagint, will be placed at the end of each note, and distinguished from it; so that it may be omitted, if judged proper, in family reading.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW.

LITTLE is known concerning the writer of this gospel, except what he has recorded of himself.—(10:3. Notes, 9:9—13.) He is generally supposed to have written his history about eight years after our Lord's ascension, and before any other part of the New Testament was extant. It is certain that it was published at a very early period.—Many have contended, that this gospel was written in Hebrew, and that we have only a translation of it in Greek. But learned men have satisfactorily shown that this is a mistake; and that the apostle wrote his Gospel in Greek, as we now have it; though they seem willing to allow, that he also gave a Hebrew or Syriac version of it, for the use of his countrymen. The reader, who wishes to examine the subject, will find it fully discussed in Dr. Whitby's preface.

St. Matthew is supposed to be distinguished from the other evangelists, by the frequency of his references to the Old Testament. He also records more of our Lord's parables, than the others do; and, on the whole, seems more observant of the order in which events occurred. He begins his history with the genealogy of Christ, in the line of Joseph, the husband of Mary his mother; and relates some circumstances concerning his miraculous conception, birth, and infancy. He gives us a brief account of the ministry of John the Baptist; and records the baptism and temptation of Christ, and his entrance on his public ministry. He then proceeds with the narrative of his miracles and discourses, till at length he fully records the manner of his crucifixion, death, and burial; and, having borne witness to his glorious resurrection, and appearance to his disciples, closes his history with some most important words, which the Lord Jesus is supposed to have spoken immediately before his ascension into heaven.

CHAPTER I.

The genealogy of Christ in the line of Joseph, from Abraham and David, 1—17. His miraculous conception, by the Holy Ghost, of the virgin Mary: and the doubts of Joseph, to whom she was espoused, removed by an angel; who directs him to take her home, and to call the Son born of her, Jesus, 18—21. This is shown to accord with the prediction of Isaiah, 22, 23. Joseph obeys, and Jesus is born, 24, 25.

THE book of the [a]generation of Jesus Christ, [b]the son of David, [c]the son of Abraham.

2 [d]Abraham begat Isaac, and [e]Isaac begat Jacob, [f]and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren,

3 And [g]Judas begat Phares and Zara of [h]Thamar, [i]and Phares begat Esrom, and Esrom begat [k]Aram,

4 And Aram begat [l]Aminadab, and Aminadab begat [m]Naasson, and Naasson begat Salmon,

5 And [n]Salmon begat Booz of [o]Rachab, and [p]Booz begat Obed of Ruth, and [q]Obed begat Jesse,

6 And [r]Jesse begat David the king, and David the king begat [s]Solomon of [t]her that had been the wife of [u]Urias,

7 And Solomon begat [x]Roboam, and Roboam begat [y]Abia, and Abia begat [z]Asa,

8 And Asa begat [a]Josaphat, and Josaphat begat [b]Joram, and Joram begat [c]Ozias,

YEAR OF THE WORLD 4000.

9 And Ozias begat [d]Joatham, and Joatham begat [e]Achaz, and Achaz begat [f]Ezekias,

10 And Ezekias begat [g]Manasses, and Manasses begat [h]Amon, and Amon begat [i]Josias,

11 And [k]Josias begat Jechonias and his brethren, [l]about the time they were carried away to Babylon:

12 And after they were brought to Babylon, [m]Jechonias begat Salathiel, [n]and Salathiel begat Zorobabel,

13 And Zorobabel begat Abiud, and Abiud begat Eliakim, and Eliakim begat Azor, 14 And Azor begat Sadoc, and Sadoc begat Achim, and Achim begat Eliud, 15 And Eliud begat Eleazar, and Eleazar begat Matthan, and Matthan begat Jacob, 16 And Jacob begat [o]Joseph the husband of Mary, [p]of whom was born Jesus, [q]who is called Christ.

17 So all the generations from Abraham to David are fourteen generations; and from David until the carrying away into Babylon are fourteen generations; and from the carrying away into Babylon unto Christ are fourteen generations.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1. 'The book of Genesis,' or the Beginning, that is, the original of the heavens and the earth, stands first in the Old Testament; and the same word in the Greek, introduces the history contained in the New Testament: but here it signifies the generation, or stock and race of Him, as Man, who, as God, created all things, and at length appeared in human nature to redeem mankind from sin and misery. This promised Saviour had been long foretold, as the son of Abraham and of David; and therefore the inspired writer, having mentioned his name JESUS, and his office or appointment, as the CHRIST, the MESSIAH, the Anointed of God, proceeded to declare that he was the son of Abraham and of David, in order to introduce the subsequent genealogy, by which that claim would in part be authenticated. (Marg. Ref.)—The whole New Testament, however, shows, that this was not considered as the only or the main proof that Jesus was the Son of David. For the genealogies are not once referred to in this argument; but the appeal is made to the ancient prophecies, and to his own miracles, and to his resurrection from the dead. (Acts 13:23,31—37. Rom. 1:3,4. 2 Tim. 2:8.)

V. 2—17. Various difficulties have been started, in respect of this genealogy; but a few general remarks may suffice to show them to be comparatively of small consequence. It is evident, that the genealogy of Joseph, and not of Mary, is given in these verses. That of Mary is traced back to Adam by St. Luke, as it will be shown hereafter. (Note, Luke 3:34—38.) Joseph was supposed by the Jews to be the father of Jesus, and he was his father-in-law: it was therefore proper that his descent from David should be ascertained. Probably, this genealogy was copied from the public registers of the nation, which were well known: and this may account for some omissions and variations, which are found in it on comparing it with the history of the Old Testament.—The other children of Abraham are not mentioned with Isaac, nor is Esau, who was the twin-brother of Jacob, and elder than he: for their descendants were not interested in "the covenants of promise." But the children of Judah are mentioned, as their posterity constituted the chosen people of God; and Zara twin-brother of Phares is inserted, because part of the tribe of Judah descended from him. The names of four women are found in it, being all remarkable characters: Thamar, of whom, by incest with her father-in-law, the greatest part of the tribe of Judah descended; (Notes, Gen. 38:) Rachab, or Rahab, who seems to have been the same as had been a harlot, and an inhabitant of Jericho, but through faith was preserved from the destruction of that city; (Notes, Josh. 2:6.) for no other woman of that name is mentioned in 18 ¶ Now [r] the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother Mary was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child [s] of the Holy Ghost.

19 Then Joseph [t] her husband, being [u] a just man, and not willing to make her [x] a public example, [y] was minded to put her away privily.

20 But, [z] while he thought on these things, behold, [a] the angel of the Lord appeared unto him [b] in a dream, saying, [c] Joseph, thou son of David, [d] fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for [e] that which is [*] conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.

21 And [f] she shall bring forth a son, and [g] thou shalt call his name JESUS: [h] for he shall save his people from their sins.

22 Now all this was done, [i] that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying,

23 Behold, [k] a virgin shall be with child, and scripture: Ruth, the Moabitess; and Bathsheba, who had been the wife of Uriah, with whom David had committed adultery. This might intimate that Christ was "made in the likeness of sinful flesh," and came to save the Gentiles and the vilest of sinners. Three kings, the immediate descendants of Athaliah, by Joram the son of Jehoshaphat, viz. Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah, are passed over without notice. Perhaps it was found so in the genealogies; and they who compiled them, aiming to reduce the number of genealogies, from David to the captivity, to fourteen, as well as that from Abraham to David, thought these descendants of that wicked woman, by an unhallowed fatal marriage, might most properly be omitted. But some think, that Matthew was directed to leave them out for similar reasons.—In some manuscripts it is found, "Josiah begat Jehoiakim, and Jehoiakim Jeconias:" and it is certain that Jeconias was grandson to Josiah, and the father or grandfather of Salathiel; nor does it appear that he had any brethren, for his uncle Zedekiah succeeded him when he was carried to Babylon.—From Jeconiah, who was carried captive, to Joseph the husband of Mary, were also fourteen generations: and at that time the illustrious house of David was so reduced, that its rights, in the line of Solomon, centered in a poor carpenter: at least he was that descendant, whom the Lord chose to stand in the place of a legal father to the promised Messiah; that so this expected Prophet, Priest, and King might spring up "as a tender Plant out of a dry ground."—The marginal references contain nearly all the information which can be obtained on the subject of this genealogy.—It is probable that some names are omitted between Salmon and David. (Note, Ruth 4:18—22.) And either the marginal addition of Jakim or Jehoiakim, must be admitted, or Jeconias in the twelfth verse must be considered as the son of Jeconias mentioned in the eleventh: for otherwise the fourteen generations are not completed.—'Perhaps interpreters might save themselves the trouble of giving a reason of many things contained in this catalogue, by saying, St. Matthew here recites it as he found it in the authentic copies of the Jews; who doubtless had preserved some known and approved genealogy of their descent from Abraham, the father of their nation, in whom they so much gloried, and from whose loins they expected the promised Messiah.' Whitby. It is conceded that this genealogy does not prove that Jesus was "the son of David," but merely that Joseph, the husband of Mary and the father-in-law of Jesus, was descended from David. But the customs of the Jews, in genealogies, required this genealogy of Joseph to be produced: and it leaves the proof, arising from Mary's descent from David, as stated by St. Luke, in full force; and that is perfectly conclusive. For if "Jacob the son of Matthan the son of Eleazar, begat Joseph," (15,16.) Joseph could be "the son of Heli, the son of Matthat, the son of Levi." (Luke 3:23,24.)

V. 18, 19. In 'the Gospel according to St. Luke,' we find a variety of circumstances which are here omitted: but this succinct narrative was deemed sufficient to introduce that history of Christ, which was first given to the church. His mother Mary, a virgin of the house of David, had been contracted or betrothed to Joseph; but they had not completed the intended marriage, when it was found that she was with child. By a most extraordinary miracle, she had, continuing a virgin, conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit; that the promised Saviour might be "the Seed of the woman," in the strictest sense; and though truly man, our Brother and Redeemer, yet not be conceived and born in sin. (Notes, Gen. 3: 4,15. Is. 7:14. Jer. 31:21,22.) But Mary's espousals, before the time of her miraculous conception, sheltered her character from injurious suspicions; and a pious and prudent person was thus engaged to afford her assistance, in the care of her son Jesus. When Joseph, who was now considered as the husband of Mary, found that she was pregnant, and probably heard from her an account of the vision which she had seen; (Luke 1:26—38.) and perhaps learned such circumstances from Zacharias and Elizabeth, as tended to confirm her narration; he was at a loss how to act on so extraordinary an occasion. He might not be able to give full credit to what he had heard; and yet be unwilling to suspect a person whom he so much valued, of having been false to him, and then of forming so strange a story to cover her guilt. But being a just, or a conscientious, god'y man, he was neither willing in such circumstances to complete the marriage, nor yet to expose her to public disgrace and punishment; for, according to the law, she would have been condemned to be stoned as an adulteress, if she had been proved guilty of incontinency after having been betrothed: and if he had declared his reasons for putting her away, without proceeding further against her, it would have exposed her character to lasting disgrace. He therefore purposed privately, (that is, before two witnesses,) to give her a bill of divorcement, and to put her away, without assigning his reasons for so doing.—Some have thought, that reverence of Mary, when he found she was with child by the Holy Ghost, deterred him from marrying her; but, though this might increase his perplexity, it is plain from the angel's answer to his objections, that they were not of this kind. (20,21.)

To make her a public example. (19) Παραδειγματισαι.—Παραδειγματιζοντας, "putting to open shame." (Heb. 6:6. See Sept. Jer. 8:22. Ez. 28:17.)

V. 20, 21. Whilst Joseph meditated on these matters, he fell asleep; and in his dream he was favoured with a vision of a holy angel, sent from God to direct him how to act. The angel addressed him as "The son of David," as one of that illustrious family, and probably the legal heir of its dignities. Perhaps few persons regarded him, in his reduced condition, on that account, and he himself might think little of such a neglected distinction. He had been afraid of acting contrary to his duty, reputation, interest, or peace, if he should proceed to complete his marriage with Mary, though considered as his legal wife; but the angel showed him, that these fears were unnecessary; for it would be profitable and proper for him to take her home to him, as the Lord had so ordered matters for wise and important reasons. The child, with which he knew her to be pregnant, was indeed conceived in her by the miraculous operation of the Holy Spirit; and would prove a Son, of which she would in due time be delivered; and then he, as the husband of Mary, and the supposed and legal father, was directed to call him JESUS.—It has been before observed, that the word JESUS is the same as Joshua, or Jehoshua, only framed to the Greek pronunciation and termination. Joshua, who brought the tribes of Israel into the rest of Canaan, was originally called Oshea; (Num. 13:8.) but it was afterwards changed into Jehoshua, by an addition of the first syllable of the divine name, JEHOVAH; perhaps intimating that not Joshua of himself, but JEHOVAH by him, would complete the deliverance of Israel. (Note, Num. 13:16.) As this name was given to the promised Messiah, it signified, as it has been sufficiently proved JEHOVAH, THE SAVIOUR, or JEHOVAH-SALVATION; and it was given him, because "he shall save his people from their sins." He delivers all, who believe and obey him, from the guilt, condemnation, dominion, and pollution of all their sins, and finally, he will save them from the very existence and from all the effects of sin, when "death shall be swallowed up in victory," and sorrow in everlasting felicity. (Marg. Ref. h.)

V. 22, 23. This seems to be the evangelist's observation on these extraordinary events; yet it is probable, the angel showed Joseph, that this child was He, to whom all the prophets bare witness. The prophecy has already been explained. (Note, Is. 7:14.) The child to be born of a virgin could have no human father.—The solemn introduction, in the prophecy, "The Lord himself will give thee a sign:" and the call to attention, and even admiration, in the word, "Behold,"—"Behold, the LORD himself,"—imply that some extraordinary and unprecedented event was intended: but the marriage of a virgin, and a son being born of her, in consequence of her marriage, are events of common occurrence, and could not, with the least propriety, have been announced in this manner. This prophecy was in the strictest sense fulfilled, when the Virgin Mary's Son was called Jesus; for, JEHOVAH-SALVATION, and IMMANUEL, GOD WITH US, are expressions of similar signification. If God be with us sinners in Jesus Christ, he is "become our Salvation."—But the Saviour has been known to vast multitudes, through successive generations, and been peculiarly dear to them, by his name EMMANUEL: and he will be so, to the end of time, yea, to all eternity.—They shall call. (23) 'Thou shalt call:' Sept. Is. 7:14. which accords to the Hebrew. Some copies read it so here.

shall bring forth a son, and [l]they shall call his name [m]Emmanuel, which being interpreted is, [m]God with us.

24 Then Joseph being raised from sleep [n]did as the angel of the LORD had bidden him, and took unto him his wife:

25 And knew her not till [o]she had brought forth her first-born son: [p]and he called his name JESUS.

Or, his name shall be called. l Is. 7:14. 8:8. Immanuel. m 28:20. Ps. 46:7, 11. Is. 8:8—10. 9:6,7. 12:2. John 1:14. Acts 18:9,10. V. 24, 25. This heavenly vision fully satisfied the mind of Joseph, and, rendering implicit obedience, he delayed not to take Mary home to him as his wife; providing thus for her reputation and comfort in her present circumstances, as far as it was in his power; but he had no conjugal intercourse with her, "till she had brought forth her first-born Son." Some reference in this expression might be had to Christ, as the "First-born of every creature," the Heir of all things, and "in all things having the pre-eminence:" but it seems rather to relate to the law of Moses, concerning the first-born male being consecrated to God. (Marg. Ref. o.) Jesus being called Mary's first-born Son does not prove that she had more children afterwards: nor did it seem good to the Holy Spirit to gratify men's foolish curiosity, about the terms on which Joseph and Mary afterwards lived together. They who have contended for, and those who have denied, Mary's perpetual virginity, have alike wandered in the pathless regions of uncertain and useless conjecture. It is true, that some of the zealous champions for the affirmative intended to give some support to their antichristian worship of the Virgin Mary, and their antichristian admiration of virginity and celibacy: but we want no additional proof that God alone ought to be worshipped, and that "marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The Lord proves his people's faith and patience by long delays: but his promises stand sure, and will all be fulfilled in due season; nor can we have the least ground for doubting the rest: as that grand promise, of the incarnation of his beloved Son, to be our Surety and atoning Sacrifice, has been exactly verified.—In reviewing the generations of men who have lived on earth, how vain, transitory, and worthless do all things here below appear! We pass as shadows over the plain, and move on as a pageant over the stage: and except we have a nobler and more enduring inheritance in heaven, it would have been better for us if we had never been born, whatever distinctions we may have possessed on earth. We may also profitably observe the fluctuations in outward circumstances, and the discordant characters of those who appear in the same genealogy; hence we should learn to expect our happiness from God, and in heaven; and not to flatter our minds with empty hopes concerning our posterity, of whom we cannot know whether they will be rich or poor, wise or foolish, holy or unholy, honourable or dishonourable, happy or miserable. When the Son of God was pleased to assume our nature, he came as near to us, in all the circumstances of our fallen condition, as consisted with his being perfectly free from sin: and whilst we read some of the names in his genealogy, we should not forget how the Lord of glory stooped, to save the most guilty and depraved of the human race. How absurd then must it be, for men to reproach others with the crimes of their ancestors, or to glory in the virtues or honours of their own!

V. 18—23. We should often recollect the circumstances in which the Son of God made his entrance into this lower world; that we may learn to despise the distinctions of rank, birth, or affluence, when compared with the real dignity which piety and holiness confer. A poor obscure virgin, espoused to a carpenter, was chosen to be the honoured mother of him "by whom kings reign," and before whom they must all appear in judgment! Doubtless he could have assumed our nature in an imperial palace, as well as in an obscure cottage, or rather a humble stable. But his dignity and honour were of a more exalted and heavenly nature, and like his "kingdom, which is not of this world." Indeed, "that honour which cometh from God only," is seldom unattended with humiliating and distressing trials. She, whom God pronounced "highly favoured and blessed among women," was in danger of being suspected of the most atrocious crimes, by him whose opinion and affection must have been more regarded than those of any other person; nay, of being exposed to the deepest infamy and most terrible punishment. Let us not, then, expect to escape calumnies and suspicions, even as to those things in which we act most conscientiously, or from those persons whom we most love and esteem. But, being careful to keep a clear conscience, let us leave it to the Lord to protect our characters: and if appearances should at any time be against us, let us not be over anxious to vindicate ourselves, but keep on in the path of duty, and wait till he shall justify us from unmerited reproaches. In this way he will in due season appear for us; and if in the mean time we meet with severe mortifications, let us remember that we need them "as thorns in the flesh," to keep down our pride, which would otherwise

CHAPTER II.

Wise men from the east, guided by a star, come to Jerusalem, inquiring for "him, who was born King of the Jews," 1, 2. Herod, being alarmed, learns that Christ should be born at Bethlehem, and sends the wise men thither, 3—8. The star guides them to Jesus, whom they honour and worship; and, being warned by God, they return home another way, 9—12. Joseph is directed to go, with the child and his mother, into Egypt, 13—15. Herod murders the children at and near Bethlehem, 16—18. After Herod's death, Joseph returns from Egypt, with Jesus and Mary, and goes to dwell at Nazareth, 19—23.

NOW when [a]Jesus was born in [b]Bethlehem of Judea in the days [c]of Herod the king, be tarnish all our endowments and services.—In dubious cases, it behooves a pious man to deliberate with great attention, and to choose the lenient rather than the severer judgment or measures: and though we ought by no means to connect ourselves with persons whose conduct would be likely to expose our characters to disgrace, yet we should not judge by appearances: and we are sometimes liable to scrupulous fears, when our duty, interest, credit, and comfort require us to proceed. But he who desires to know, that he may do the will of God, and uses proper means of instruction, shall not be left to fall into any fatal error. We cannot now expect immediate revelations, or angelic interpreters of the mind of God; but we may discover it, as it stands revealed in his word, and be thus enabled to proceed with confidence and comfort.—But whilst we make observations on the circumstances of this extraordinary conception and birth, let us not overlook the end for which the Son of God was manifested in our nature. Men may pervert and abuse, or they may object to the sacred truths of God's word; but surely none can be encouraged to continue in sin, by a free and gracious salvation from sin! None can have evidence that they are the people of Christ, who are not now saved from the dominion of their sins, and are not seeking continually for deliverance from the remaining power and pollution of them. Every time that we name the sacred name of JESUS, we should be reminded to rely on him for this complete salvation; that we may be delivered from guilt and from sin, and saved in him, "the LORD our Righteousness," "with an everlasting salvation." Then may we rejoice that "God is with us," as our reconciled Friend and Portion, in every place, and in all the circumstances of mortal life. EMMANUEL will be our Strength and Song in all our tribulations, and in the hour of death: we shall daily experience the fulfilling of the scriptures, and be enabled to proceed with comfort in the path of unreserved obedience; and all our perplexities and troubles will soon terminate in glory, honour, and immortal felicity.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Herod was an Edomite by descent, though proselyted to the Jewish religion. He obtained the kingdom of Judea by favour of the Romans, and by means of much war and bloodshed. He reigned in prosperity for about thirty-five years, but his whole administration was tarnished with the most horrible cruelties. Among many others, he put to death his wife, Mariamne, and two of his own sons. He was seventy years of age, but as full of ambition and jealousy, and as prompt to every act of tyranny and cruelty as ever, at the time when these wise men came to inquire about the birth of Christ. The original word is Magoi, or Magians: Magoi, and words derived from it, are used in the New Testament in a bad sense: (Acts, 8:9,11. 13:6,8. Gr.) yet there was a sect of philosophers, and indeed of religionists, who were called by this name, and who seem to have come nearer to many truths of revealed religion, than almost any other of the heathen. Probably these were men of some eminence and learning, belonging to that sect.—An opinion at that time prevailed throughout all the east, that an extraordinary person was about to arise in Judea, who would acquire the dominion over the nations; which doubtless originated from a partial acquaintance with the writings of the ancient prophets, and from the Jews dispersed in great numbers in all these countries.—These sages, or wise men, no doubt, expected this event, and were looking out for some intimations of its taking place: and, it is probable, that they were also favoured with divine intimations of its speedy approach, and shown something of the Redeemer's real glory, and the nature of his Kingdom.—It is not agreed of what country they were. Many think that they came out of Arabia; and from the opinion that the prophecy of David was fulfilled by them, (Ps. 72:9,10.) the absurd popish legend that they were three kings, seems to have arisen.—The remoter regions of Arabia extended far to the south of Judea; and the queen of Sheba, called "the queen of the south," (12:42.) is by many supposed to have come from thence. (Note, 1 Kings 10:1,2.) The Magians resided chiefly in Persia, and in countries still further to the east; and it is not improbable that these Magi came from those regions. An extraordinary luminous appearance in the heavens, which they noticed, induced them to this journey, as they assuredly gathered from it that One was born to be "the King of the Jews." But they could not reasonably have drawn this conclusion, unless God, who thus excited their attention, had also in some other way explained it to them; perhaps by a supernatural dream. Being thus excited and instructed, they hesitated not to take a long and expensive journey, in order to pay their early homage and worship to the new-born [illegible] hold, there came wise men [d]from the east to Jerusalem,

2 Saying, Where is he that is [e]born King of the Jews? for we have seen [f]his star in the east, and are come to [g]worship him.

3 ¶ When Herod the king had heard these things, [h]he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.

4 And when he had gathered all [i]the chief priests and [k]scribes of the people together, [l]he demanded of them where Christ should be born.

5 And they said unto him, [m]In Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet,

6 And [n]thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come [o]a Governor, that shall [p]rule my people Israel.

7 Then Herod, [q]when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared.

8 And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, [q]Go, and search diligently for the young child; and, when ye have found him, bring me word again, [r]that I may come and worship him also.

[Practical Observations.]

9 When they had heard the king, they departed: and, lo, [s]the star which they saw in the east went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

10 When they saw the star, [t]they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.

11 And when they were come into the house, [u]they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and [x]worshipped him: and when they had opened their treasures, [y]they [z]presented unto him gifts, gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

the Jews," who, as they understood, would in due time reign over the nations. Probably they supposed that the inhabitants of Jerusalem were well acquainted with the event, and therefore they directed their course thither, and openly made inquiry concerning him who was "born" to be "King of the Jews," (yet perhaps with some application to the chief priests and elders of the nation,) declaring both what they had seen, and for what purpose they were come.—This was an early intimation of the calling of the Gentiles into the church of Christ, even when the Jews would neglect him, and be rejected by him; and it was a call to the nation to consider Jesus as their long expected, promised Messiah.—'Christ, a poor child laid in a crib, and nothing set by of his own people, receiveth notwithstanding a noble witness of his divinity from heaven, and of his kingly estate from strangers.' Beza.—It is plain that these wise men did not arrive at Bethlehem till after the presentation of Christ at the temple; (Notes, 9—12. Luke 2:36—39.)—It is likely that Joseph and Mary purposed settling at Bethlehem, and had procured some house or lodging there in which they at this time resided.

V. 3—6. Though Herod was very old, and had never shown much affection for his family, yet, being a suspicious tyrant, he no sooner heard of "the King of the Jews," than he began to be haunted with the dread of a rival. He neither understood the spiritual nature of the Messiah's kingdom, nor yet considered that a new-born infant was not likely to give him any disquietude: so that he was greatly troubled at the tidings. The citizens of Jerusalem, also, not having formed any proper judgment of the blessings to be expected from the Messiah, were put into general consternation: they had witnessed so many of Herod's cruelties whenever a competitor was suspected, that they seemed to have dreaded new scenes of confusion and bloodshed, and thus were troubled at that event which should have given them the highest satisfaction. Herod, however, by a strange mixture of regard to the word of God, and contempt of it, supposing that the ancient prophecies were about to be fulfilled, and yet hoping to defeat them, framed a plan for that purpose! And first he convened "the priests and scribes," or the heads of the twenty-four courses, with the high-priest as their stated superior, and the professed interpreters of the law, that he might know assuredly from them, at what place the promised Messiah was to be born; intending to use this information to direct the wise men where to find him, and then by their means devising to discover and cut him off: and thus, by one blow, to render abortive all the purposes and prophecies of God from the beginning! To this question they returned a very proper answer, referring in confirmation of it to a prophecy which has been already considered. (Note, Micah 5:2.) The text is here quoted something differently than it stands in our version of that prophet, especially it is here said "Thou art not the least, &c." Some propose reading the clause in Micah interrogatively, "Art thou little among the thousands of Judah?" It is, however, plain that the sense, rather than the exact words of the Old Testament prophecies, is quoted in many places of the New Testament; and that though these quotations are often taken from the Septuagint, yet that is not uniformly nor exactly adhered to.—'And thou, Bethlehem, the house of Ephratha, art one of the least to be among the thousands of Judah: out of thee shall one come forth to me, to be for a ruler of Israel.' Sept. 'Though thou be a small town, yet thou shalt be famous and noble through the birth of the Messiah, who shall be born in thee.'

"Bethlehem in the land of Judah," (6) as distinguished from another Bethlehem. (Josh. 19:15.)—The word princes is here substituted for thousands. 'The people was distributed by thousands, so many in a town or city; not that the number was so to continue, but (as . . . in our hundreds, which were at first an hundred families precisely,) only in relation to the first distribution.' Hammond.

Rule. (6) Ποιμανεῖ, feed. (Marg.) Rev. 19:15. Gr.—He shall rule, as a shepherd does his flock; who in feeding, rules, and in ruling, feeds. Sometimes, however, the word is used where either ruling or feeding is exclusively meant. It frequently occurs in the Sept.—'Kings are fitly called feeders and shepherds of the people.' Beza.

V. 7, 8. Herod, having learned the place of Christ's birth, next conferred with the wise men, that he might exactly discover from them the time when the star first appeared, from which he meant to compute or conjecture the age of his infant Rival. Having learned this, he dismissed them with directions to go to Bethlehem, exhorting them diligently to search for the young Child in that city; assured that under the divine direction they would certainly find him: and then requiring them to bring information of it, that he might render him the same honours which they intended. Thus far he employed some degree of absurd policy; but surely it was attended with a judicial infatuation; for otherwise he would either have sent messengers along with the wise men, to conduct them and show them respect; or he would have ordered spies to follow them, who, when they had found the Child, might suddenly have surprised and slain him. But to leave the whole success of his design to these strangers, so that it must miscarry, if they suspected his sincerity, or did not choose to give him information, was a very feeble measure for so experienced a politician, who was not used to do works of impiety or cruelty by halves. Nor was it less wonderful, that neither piety, nor curiosity, nor other motives of any kind, induced a single Jew to accompany the wise men on this pious research, when Bethlehem was not more than seven or eight miles from Jerusalem! But the dread of Herod's cruel indignation, as well as disregard to all spiritual concerns, seems to have thrown them all into a kind of stupor on the occasion.

Inquired . . . diligently. (7) Ηκριβωσε. 16.—Ακριβῶς (from the same root,) is rendered diligently; 8. Acts 18:25; circumspectly; Eph. 5:15; perfectly; 1 Thes. 5:2.—It means also exactly, accurately. See Acts 18:26. 22:3. 23:15,20. 24:22. 26:5. Gr. ('Quidam deducunt παρα το εις ακρον βαινειν, quod ab imo ad supremum ascendatur: quod est exquisitæ perfectæque diligentiæ.' Scapula.)

V. 9—12. Notwithstanding the ignorance and inattention of the Jews, the eastern sages prosecuted the design of their journey, by setting out for Bethlehem; and to recompense their pious and believing constancy, the star, which they had seen in their own country, again appeared to them: and, going before them, became stationary just above the house where Jesus was. Hence it appears that it was no star, (properly so called,) or planet, or comet; but a luminous meteor in our atmosphere, which at a distance looked like a star, and which was formed by God for that purpose, and could descend so low, as to mark out a single house in the midst of the city as the cloudy pillar pointed out the spot, where Israel was to encamp in the wilderness.—It is evident, that Joseph and Mary resided at this time in Bethlehem; and that from thence they fled into Egypt.—When the wise men saw the star, they were assured of success in their undertaking: and therefore they rejoiced exceedingly, (the original is peculiarly emphatical,) and entered the house, which doubtless was a very different abode from what they had expected for "the King of the Jews;" and having seen the infant Jesus with his mother, 13 ¶ And when they were departed, behold, [c]the angel of the LORD appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, [d]Arise, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there, [e]until I bring thee word: [f]for Herod will [g]seek the young child to destroy him.

they were not offended by his mean circumstances, but acknowledged him as their Lord and King, prostrating themselves before him and worshipping him: and, opening the treasures which they had brought with them for that purpose, they presented him with the choicest productions of their country, even "gold, and frankincense, and myrrh." Some have supposed, that the frankincense and myrrh were intended as an acknowledgment of his deity, as the gold was of his royalty: and this was the opinion of the fathers in general. We may, however, conclude, that the Lord, who directed and prospered their journey, gave them also some measure of knowledge concerning those things which related to the person and offices of this new-born King; that their worship was of the same nature with that of other believers in every age; and that their abundant joy arose from a persuasion, that they had found the salvation of God for their souls, as well as "the King of the Jews."—Having obtained the purpose of their journey, they meant to report their success at Jerusalem, before they went home: but the Lord warned them, in a dream, not to return to Herod; and so they took a more direct way, and defeated his impious project. Probably, when they arrived in their own country, they spread the report of what they had seen, heard, and learned; and this would be a preparation for the future preaching of the gospel in those regions. 'Notwithstanding the homeliness of the place, and the mean appearance of the parents,... they, acknowledging some more than human majesty in that child, fell down and worshipped him, and presented unto him the most precious gifts which their country yielded.' Bp. Hall.—'The very valuable presents which the Magi offered, notwithstanding they found the child in so mean a condition, showed the strong ideas with which they were impressed of his dignity.' Gilpin.

Warned of God. (12) Χρηματισθεντες. See on Acts 11:26.

V. 13—15. The Lord easily defeated the subtle malice of Herod, who was determined if possible to destroy his supposed Rival; and an angel in a dream directed Joseph without delay to flee into Egypt, with the young Child and his mother, and there to wait till he had orders to return. Accordingly he was "obedient to the heavenly vision," and arose immediately, and that very night set out on his journey. Thus "the King of the Jews" was driven as an exile out of the land: "he came to his own, and his own received him not;" but he was driven to seek shelter in a country, which had ever been most hostile to the people of God. It now appeared, how wisely the Lord had ordered it, in engaging so prudent and pious a person as Joseph, by his espousals to Mary, to afford her his assistance in these difficult circumstances. And the oblations of the eastern sages would prove a very seasonable supply, to enable the holy family to bear the expenses of so long a journey, and of their maintenance in a foreign country. In this exiled state they remained till the death of Herod, which seems to have taken place a few months after.—The Evangelist adds, "That it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my Son." (Note, Hos. 11:1.) Many prophecies seem to have had a double meaning, both respecting the church, and Christ the Head of the church. And there appears to have been a particular intention of Providence in Christ's going into Egypt, that he might come up at the divine call from the same place, whence the nation of Israel had been brought.—Every circumstance favours the conclusion, that Joseph was warned to flee into Egypt, immediately after the departure of the wise men; and that he considered the case to be so urgent, as not to admit of the least delay. —Numbers of Jews were settled in Egypt, which would render his situation more comfortable, than it would otherwise have been.—'Herein was fulfilled,... in a higher degree, that which was spoken by Hosea.... That which he spake of the people of Israel, which were the sons of God by choice and adoption, was now fulfilled in him, who was the natural and eternal Son of the Father.' Bp. Hall.—'These words can import no less, than that the calling of Christ out of Egypt was by God intended as a completion of these words: and that till he was called thence, they had not their full and ultimate completion.' Whitby

Out of Egypt, &c. (15) This is rendered in the LXX. "Out of Egypt have I called his children:" but the Evangelist gives the sense of the Hebrew.

V. 16—18. Herod, after waiting for some time, found that the wise men did not return to him; and, supposing their conduct to arise from suspicion or contempt, he deemed himself greatly dishonoured by it. Thus his jealousy, disappointment, and indignation concurred in working him up to a degree of rage, which bordered on madness: and, determining to make sure, as he thought, of the destruction of his hated competitor, he sent forth, as it is probable, some of the soldiers that composed his guard, and slew all the male children, that were found in Bethlehem and the dependent villages, which were under two years of age; taking large measure enough, but having respect to the time, at which the wise men informed him they had first seen the star. Thus the date of Christ's birth was publicly marked; and the pretensions of all others to be the Messiah, as born at Bethlehem about the same time, were cut off. This event formed another accomplishment of the prophecy of Jeremiah, which we have already considered. (Note, Jer. 31:15—17.)—Rachel, who lay buried betwixt Rama and Bethlehem, (Gen. 35:16—20.) might be poetically represented on this occasion to weep inconsolably for the slaughter of her children. Doubtless many of the descendants of Joseph and Benjamin were murdered, as well as those of Judah, in this massacre. It may be observed, that the Evangelist does not say "That it might be fulfilled;" but "Then was fulfilled." It was a fulfilment of the words, though not the event immediately predicted.—Imagination can better conceive, than the pen can describe, the horrors of so brutal a scene, and the anguish of the tender mothers over their infant offspring, torn from their arms, and butchered before their eyes; it is doubtless almost impossible to form an idea of any wickedness more completely diabolical. Indeed some have objected to the authenticity of the narrative on this ground; but the following account of Herod's last purpose and deed, will satisfy the reader that there was nothing too vile for that wretched man to perpetrate. 'Knowing the hatred the Jews had for him, he concluded aright, that there would be no lamentation at his death, but rather gladness and rejoicing all the country over. To prevent this he framed a project and resolution in his mind, which was one of the horridest, and most wicked, perchance, that ever entered into the heart of man. For, having issued out a summons to all the principal... Jews of his kingdom, commanding their appearance at Jericho, (where he then lay,) on pain of death, at a day appointed; on their arrival thither he shut them all up in the circus, and then sending for Salome his sister, and Alexas her husband, commanded them, that as soon as he was dead, they should send in the soldiers upon them, and put them all to the sword. For this, said he, will provide mourning for my funeral all over the land, and make the Jews in every family lament my death, whether they will or no: and when he had adjured them hereto, some hours after, he... died. But they, not being wicked enough to do what they had been made solemnly to promise, rather chose to break their obligation, than to make themselves the executioners of so bloody and horrid a design.' Prideaux.—Nor need it be wondered at that Josephus does not record the slaughter of the infants; for he evidently chose to make the best of Herod's bad character, though in many things he could not conceal its infamy; and he never without reluctance mentioned any circumstances, which led him to give his thoughts of Christianity. Yet he could not but know, that Matthew had recorded it as a known matter of fact; and, as he never contradicted or disputed it, he may be said to have tacitly allowed the truth of it. As, however, internal and external evidences sufficiently demonstrate the evangelist's divine inspiration, we need no corroborating testimony to confirm the fact.

In Rama, &c. (18) This quotation is not made from the LXX, but is an exact translation of the Hebrew.

V. 19—23. In a few months after Herod had perpetrated the massacre of the infants, he ended his life and cruelties together, in a manner almost too shocking to be related: he endured such excruciating, lingering, and loathsome diseases, as rendered him intolerable to himself and others also. fore his death, he caused Antipater, his son and the heir apparent of his kingdom, to be executed on some groundless suspicion.—An angel was sent to Joseph to admonish him to go back with the young child and his mother into the land of Israel, as they were dead who had sought the young child's life. Perhaps Antipater had concurred with Herod in attempting to destroy Jesus. Joseph, however, immediately returned into the land of Judah: but finding that Archelaus, the son of Herod, had obtained from the Romans the government of that part of the country in which Bethlehem was situated, and perhaps learning that he was of a jealous, cruel disposition, he feared to settle there; but, being further admonished of God, he went into Galilee, in the northern part of the land, which was under the rule of Philip, who was of a more quiet temper, and fixed his residence at Nazareth, where we find from St. Luke that he had formerly dwelt. The sacred historian, on this occasion, adds, "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene."—He 'does not cite any particular prophet for these words, as he had done, (15,17. 1:22.)... but only what was spoken by the prophets in general;... he took not the words from the prophets, but the sense only.... Most of the prophets speak of Christ as of a person that was to be reputed vile and abject, despised and rejected of men.... (Ps. 69:9,10. Is. 53:3.) ... Now the Nazarene was a name of infamy put upon Christ and Christians, both by the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles.... This title... they always gave by way of contempt to our Jesus, because he was supposed to come out of this city: yea, his very going to dwell there was one occasion of his being... despised and rejected by the Jews. (John 1:46. 7:52.)...The angel sent him to this contemptible place, that he might thence have a name of infamy and contempt put upon him, according to the frequent intimations of the prophets.' Whitby.—Others consider the word Nazarene as of the same import with Nazarite; and as derived from נזר, to separate.—The same word is used of Joseph, who was one separated from his brethren. (Gen. 49:26. Deut. 33:16. Heb.)—'As Joseph was by his brethren sold into Egypt, so is Christ by the persecution of Herod driven thither: as Joseph was "separated from his brethren" and cast out from among them, so was Christ, for fear of Archelaus, separated from his own tribe of Judah, and constrained to dwell in Nazareth of Galilee, whose name may denote that flight or separation.' Hammond.—The Nazarites, or separated ones, were peculiarly consecrated to God: and, if we allow any thing typical in that remarkable appointment, we cannot but recollect that Jesus was "holy, harmless, undefiled and separated from sinners;" and that "for our sakes he sanctified himself," or consecrated himself to God to be our atoning Sacrifice.—Indeed he did not observe the law of the Nazarite, and on that account was not called a Nazarite: yet to mark him out, as the Antitype of this typical order, he dwelt at Nazareth during the greatest part of his life, and so was called "the Nazarene," which is a word of a similar meaning. Sampson was "called a Nazarite from the womb:" (Judg. 13:5.) and he was a remarkable type of Christ, both as delivering his people by his own strength, without their help, and as triumphing over his and their enemies even by his death. —Many, however, derive the word Nazareth from נצר, a branch; and suppose those prophecies to be referred to, in which Christ is promised under the title of THE BRANCH.—'The appellation which is given him of a Nazarene, however it be objected to him by way of reproach, is rather a notable proof of his answerableness to that prediction of the prophets; especially that of Isaiah, who, by "the root of Jesse" whence he should come, describes Bethlehem, the dwelling of Jesse, for the place of his birth; and by that Netzar, (or Branch,) which should arise from that root, meant to allude to the place of his abode and education.' Bp. Hall.—It should, however, be noted that the ץ in the word נצר, a branch, is perhaps never represented in Greek by any other letter than Σ.—The interpretation given by Dr. Whitby, is, to me at least, by far the most satisfactory.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. It is often found, that they who live at a distance from the means of grace, are led to use double diligence, and thus first get acquainted with Christ and his salvation.—But neither natural science, nor abstruse speculations, nor curious arts, can avail in this great concern. The sacred scripture must be searched with attentive diligence, obedient faith, and fervent prayer. This is "a light shining in a dark place:" and those who follow this sacred direction, will spare no labour or expense in inquiring after Jesus, our Prince and Saviour; they will desire to render him honour and submission; they will devote their talents to his service, and not be reluctant to avow their expectations from him and obligations to him. But, alas! should eastern sages, or strangers from distant nations, come to many of those cities where Christianity is now professed, purposely to inquire after Christ and his religion, how little satisfaction would they find from the rulers and teachers of the church! and how much would they be surprised at the ignorance and inattention of those who have the best opportunities of instruction, respecting the truths and duties of their holy profession! Such inquirers would not, indeed, excite much consternation or uneasiness, either to princes or people: but they would probably occasion great astonishment, and even incur the contempt and derision of those who never bestowed any pains in acquainting themselves with him whose disciples they profess to be. There are but few places where so much regard would be shown them, as that princes and teachers should assemble in order to consider and answer their inquiries: and even if this were done, it would perhaps be found rather to arise from profane policy, than from a cordial desire to promote the knowledge of Christ and his salvation!—The scripture must needs be fulfilled; and they who are acquainted with the Bible, and who believe that all things have been, are, and will be, according to the testimony of that blessed book, are likely to find the right way, and to point it out to others: and all who are related to Christ, and submit to him as the Governor and Shepherd of Israel, will be numbered with "the princes of his people," however little they may be in other respects.—But let us beware of a dead faith. It is plain from facts, that a man may have a prevailing persuasion of many truths, and yet hate them virulently, because they interfere with his ambition, interests, or sinful indulgence. Such a belief will give him uneasiness and strengthen his resolution of opposing the cause of God: and so great is the inconsistency of human nature, that a man may deliberately form projects to defeat those purposes which he cannot but perceive are from God; and may vainly hope for success in his impious and infatuated attempts! Indeed, this is the enmity, malignity, and misery of Satan from age to age. But "he who sitteth in heaven will laugh" at these puny enemies, yea, "the LORD will have them in derision: yet will he speak to them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure." He can easily infatuate or crush them when he sees good: yet they often for a time impose upon the unsuspecting simplicity of pious men, and by pretending to join them in honouring Christ, draw them in to forward their base designs.

V. 9—15. The Lord will guide with his counsel those who follow the teaching of his word, and wait on him for further light: he can help them even by means of ungodly men, who know more than they practise; and none shall ever seek his face in vain.—Every indication of obtaining an interest in Christ, will give a sincere and very great joy to the humble inquirer after him: he will not be stumbled at finding the Saviour or his disciples in obscure cottages, after having in vain sought them in palaces and populous cities; he will never fear honouring the Lord of glory too much, or being too entirely devoted to his service. Thus our Father, who knows what his children have need of, uses some as his stewards to supply the wants of others; and he will provide for them in every emergency, though the provision should come from the ends of the earth.—But let us remember, that this event was an indication that Jesus was "the Light of the Gentiles, as well as the glory of Israel:" and, whilst we are thankful for our mercies, let us recollect, that if we do not honour and worship him as our Lord and Saviour, who now reigns on his glorious throne, these eastern sages will rise up against us too in judgment: for they came from far to worship him as an infant in the arms of his mother.—But if we sincerely follow his guidance, he will by various interpositions direct our conduct; and he has unnumbered methods of defeating the most subtle and best concerted machinations of his enemies.

V. 16—23. It is impossible to assign any limits to the wickedness of the human heart, when furious passions and great authority combine; and when sinners are become callous by habit, and daring by impunity in atrocious crimes. The near approach of death, instead of weakening the ambition, malice, or cruelty of such men, seems to render them more in haste to seize the fleeting moment for perpetrating their enormities: as if they were afraid of not treasuring up wrath enough; or as if they would set death, and even God himself, at defiance! No wonder therefore that they are unmoved with compassion for bleeding infants and inconsolable parents, and that they seem to take delight in "lamentation, weeping, and great mourning," occasioned by their cruelties: yet are they more wretched by their own vile passions, than they can render others.—It is well for the world, that the triumphing of overgrown monsters in wickedness commonly proves short; and sometimes their miseries on this side the grave give a specimen of the dire effects of thus waging war, as it were, both against God and man. But, having observed the necessity of avoiding the beginnings of iniquity and impiety, if we would be secured from these horrid extremes, let us avert our eyes from such scenes, to contemplate the reception which the Lord of glory met with, when he condescended to 'visit us in great humility;' and from these his early persecutions and sufferings, learn what usage we must expect, if we are the children of God, in this "world which lieth in wickedness;" and at what a price all our hopes and comforts were purchased for us by our Surety. As the early honours which he received proved the occasion of his perils and fatigues; so those who belong to him cannot reasonably expect to be honoured by God, without meeting with trouble and contempt from men. Let it suffice us to be as our Master, hoping to have the promises of Scripture fulfilled to us, as the prophecies were in him. But we must not expect much solid comfort even from near and dear relations; as our children are far more frequently the occasions of care and deep distress, than of abiding satisfaction; yet we should not "refuse to be comforted," when they are taken from us. For though they die, as sinners, according to the righteous sentence of God, and not in the peculiar circumstances of these infants, who may be considered as a kind of martyrs for Christ, yet we may confidently conclude, that when they cease to be with us on earth, they are only gone before us to heaven, through "the second Adam," the Lord of life and salvation.—Wherever Providence allots us the bounds of our habitation, we must expect to share the reproach of Christ, and to be branded with some opprobrium for his sake: yet, if this be because we are consecrated to God through him, and copy his example of truth and righteousness, we may glory in the distinction; assured that "as we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together."

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1. St. Matthew entirely passes over John's parentage and birth, and the remarkable circumstances which attended them. (Notes, Luke 1:) Indeed, we are scarcely informed of any thing relating to the childhood and youth, either of Christ or of his forerunner; though we might have expected to find many curious and interesting particulars concerning them: as the one was born wholly without sin, and the other "filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb."—Some think that John entered on his public ministry about his thirtieth year; but others, who assign a longer time to his ministry before the baptism of Jesus, must conclude that he began to preach at an earlier age: as Jesus, who was only six months younger, was baptized when thirty years old.—John had spent his youth in retirement; and doubtless in contemplation and such devout exercises as were suited to prepare him for his extraordinary work: he had attained an uncommon degree of deadness to the world, of holy fortitude, zeal, humility, and devotedness to God, and of every grace and gift, which could qualify him for usefulness: and his mortified spirit and conduct were peculiarly suited to that severe ministry of the law, and that work of humiliation and reformation, by which he was to prepare the Jews for receiving their expected Messiah. But, as he was a priest, and the son of so distinguished a person as Zechariah; as his birth had been miraculous and greatly noticed, and he was himself so very excellent and remarkable a person; he could not be very obscure in his retirement. Probably, his reputation was considerable, before he entered on his public work, which might conduce to the exceeding popularity of his ministry. He was called the Baptist, or the Baptizer, because he admitted the Jews into the number of his disciples by the external right of baptism, as a sign or profession of repentance. He did not go up to Jerusalem, but opened his ministry in the wilderness, or the least populous part of the country. He came preaching, or as a herald proclaiming, the near approach of the Messiah, their expected King.—'By "those days" is meant, at that time when Jesus remained as yet an inhabitant of Nazareth.' Beza.

Preaching.] Κηρυσσων. (From κηρυξ, a herald. 1 Tim. 2:7. 2 Tim. 1:11. 2 Pet. 2:5. Gr.) 'Proclaiming a matter in an open place, in the hearing of a multitude, that many may take notice of it.' Leigh. See Hos. 5:8. Joel 1:14. Sept.

V. 2. The Jews thought that the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom belonged to them exclusively; and as they expected temporal deliverance from the Romans, with victory, prosperity, and pre-eminence, they were disposed to prepare for his coming, by levying armies and making insurrections. But the preaching of John was simply, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" which doubtless he enlarged on, explained, and applied to his hearers. "The kingdom of heaven" signifies the gospel dispensation: which is so called, because "the God of heaven" then began to set up that kingdom, which will at length fill the earth. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, Dan. 2:34,35,44,45. 7:9—14.) It is the kingdom of God and of heaven, set up among men, in opposition to the power of the devil, "the god" and "prince of this world;" and in the person of Christ, the Son of God, who "was manifested to destroy the works of the devil." Into this kingdom sinners enter by faith in Christ: then their rebellions are pardoned, they return to their allegiance, become willing subjects, and are admitted to enjoy all the immunities and privileges of the kingdom. These are all of a heavenly nature; they come from heaven, and prepare the soul for heaven, and at length issue in the felicity of heaven; which sometimes also is meant by "the kingdom of heaven." "The kingdom of heaven" 'signifies the gospel-dispensation, in which subjects were to be gathered to God by his Son, and a society formed, which was to subsist, first in more imperfect circumstances on earth, but afterwards was to appear complete in the world of glory. In some places, the phrase more particularly signifies... the state of it on earth;... and sometimes only the state of glory. ... It is plain, that the Jews understood it of a temporal monarchy, which God would erect; the seat of which, they supposed, would be Jerusalem, which would become, instead of Rome, the capital of the world. And the expected Sovereign of this kingdom, they learned from Daniel to call "the Son of Man."... Both John the Baptist, then, and Christ, took up this phrase,... and gradually taught the Jews to affix right ideas to it; though it was a lesson they were remarkably unwilling to learn. This very demand of repentance showed that it was a spiritual kingdom; and that no wicked man... could possibly be a genuine member of it.' Doddridge.—"The kingdom of heaven" is a term peculiar to St. Matthew's gospel; but "the kingdom of God" in the other parts of the New Testament seems perfectly synonymous.—This "kingdom of heaven" was at hand: the King was about to appear, to collect followers, to finish his work, to ascend his throne, to abrogate the legal dispensation, to terminate the national covenant of Israel, to admit the Gentiles into the church, and to introduce the Christian dispensation. If the Jews then meant to share the blessings of it, they must prepare for them by repentance: they must no longer trust in outward distinctions: but, comparing their tempers and conduct with the law of God, they must judge and condemn themselves, be sorry and humbled for their sins, and turn from them all, to the love and service of God.—The word rendered "repentance," implies a total revolution in the mind, a change in the judgment, dispositions, and affections, another and better bias to the soul.—Without this repentance the people could not understand the nature of the kingdom of heaven; nor could they welcome Christ, become his subjects, or desire his salvation. (Marg. Ref. e.)

Repent ye.] Μετανοειτε. Post factum sapere; quasi resapere. Beza. Mutare mentem in melius. 'After a thing has been done, to understand, and notice the error, and then at length to be wise.' 'To return to a sound mind.' (Ex μετα post, et νοεω intelligo.)

V. 3. The ministry of John fulfilled a prophecy that has been already considered. (Note, Is. 40:3—5.) John was "a voice," which conveys the mind of the speaker, and then vanishes: he declared the mind of God concerning his Son, and then was seen no more; for his ministry was of short continuance. He proclaimed Christ, as the Son of God, the King of Israel, and the Saviour of the world; (Notes, John 1:29—34. 3:27—36.) and thus "he prepared the way of the LORD," of JEHOVAH, for so the word is in Isaiah; and he made his paths straight. As pioneers level the road for a monarch, who is about to march his army through deserts, mountains, or morasses; so John's preaching, by humbling the proud, detecting the hypocrites, counteracting the prejudices of the people, rectifying their judgment, and raising their minds from low and grovelling pursuits, to aspire after things truly great and excellent, prepared the Jews for the reception of Christ.—"Make straight the paths of our God." Sept.

V. 4. (Note. 2 Kings 1:8.) We need not be very accurate in determining what John's food and raiment were. It is probable, that his outward garment was made of camel's hair, woven into coarse rough cloth; and that this was girded about him with a piece of undressed leather. His food (that is, frequently, as it may be supposed) consisted of locusts: these were allowed as clean by the law and they are often eaten in the eastern regions at this day. To this was added the honey, which the bees made in the uncultivated parts of the lands, and which was found in great plenty.—The finer parts

5 Then [m] went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6 And [n] were baptized of him in Jordan, [o] confessing their sins. [Practical Observations.] of camels' hair is indeed formed into a soft and delicate stuff; but it is manifest, that a coarse and rough garment, made of the long hair of the camel, and wrought in a rude manner, is intended. And the critical pains of learned men, to prove that a plant or pulse was meant, by the word translated "locusts," seem to have been labour in vain. (Marg. Ref.)—It is more to the purpose to observe that this extraordinary man, who was "great in the sight of the Lord," was very homely in his attire, and frugal in his diet; faring as a poor person, desiring neither abundance nor delicacies, but taking any thing which came to hand in his retirement, to satisfy his wants; being wholly intent on matters of a more important and spiritual nature. As he could live on little, and was inured to hardship, he was independent of the rich and great, and might be the more direct and plain in his reproofs of them: so that this circumstance seems to have had a considerable effect in forming the other parts of his character.

V. 5, 6. Through a divine influence on the minds of men, vast numbers were induced to resort to John in the wilderness, from all parts of Judea, and from Jerusalem; so that the whole city and country, as it were, went out to him; and he was especially attended by the inhabitants of those regions, which lay on each side the river Jordan; where, after a time, he commonly exercised his ministry. He became at length so celebrated, that the Jews of all ranks and parties flocked to him: and when they were brought to confess their sins, and to profess repentance, and a purpose of submitting to the Messiah who was at hand, and leading a new life, they were baptized by John, in, or at, the river Jordan. The law of Moses prescribed "divers washings" or baptisms, in which water was used in different ways, as an emblem of the purging of the soul from the pollution of sin, in order that the priests or people might attend on the service of God with acceptance. (Note, Heb. 9:8—10.) By degrees it became customary in the Jewish church to baptize those who were proselyted to their religion from the Gentiles, both male and female, as well as to circumcise the males: this denoted, that they deemed them unclean in themselves, and not meet to join the congregation of the Lord, till they were washed from the filthiness of their gentile state. The prophets also often alluded to this emblem of the soul's being cleansed from sin; and some passages of the New Testament intimate, that both the cleansing from guilt by the blood of Christ, and from pollution by the Spirit of Christ, were comprised under this outward sign; yet the latter is more generally intended. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) But, though baptism had been before in use, John was singular in baptizing all his disciples, notwithstanding they had before been Jews, and without distinction of previous character; thus intimating, that by nature and practice they were all polluted, and could not be admitted among the true people of God, except washed from their sins, in the fountain which the Messiah was about to open. This was done by express divine direction: (John 1:33.) but, though his use of baptism was introductory to the appointment of that ordinance, to be the initiatory sacrament and seal of the new dispensation, as circumcision had been of the old; yet we should not consider it as the same with Christian baptism: but rather as an institution for the time being, and an introduction to the change which was gradually to take place, when the old dispensation should be abrogated, and the new one substituted and openly established. Baptism, as used by John, was not intended to supersede circumcision; for it does not appear, that he baptized any but circumcised persons: except as he baptized the women among the Jews, which is no where mentioned, though it is highly probable. We cannot suppose, that he "baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," or that Jesus was thus baptized; nay, the contrary is manifest: (Notes, Acts 19:1—6.) and probably Christ's disciples did not use that peculiar form of Christian baptism, till after the ascension of their Lord.—It is also evident, that some, at least, who had received John's baptism, received Christian baptism also when admitted into the Church of Christ: for it cannot be supposed but that several of the multitude, who heard Peter on the day of Pentecost, had been John's disciples: yet he exhorted them all to be baptized in the name of Jesus, and the three thousand who gladly received the word were thus baptized. (Acts 2:38—41.)

John's baptism and Christian baptism, therefore, were not exactly the same; and inferences from the one respecting the other are inconclusive. It does not appear, that any but adults were baptized by John; for circumcision still continued in force, as the initiatory ordinance and seal of the covenant; and therefore we never read that he baptized households, as the apostles did. Adult Jews, professing repentance and a disposition to become the Messiah's subjects, were the only persons whom John admitted to baptism.—Water was the outward sign; but whether the rite was administered by immersion, or not, is incapable of decisive proof. The use of water is essential, because that is the universal purifier: the quantity and mode of application seem to be merely circumstances, varying as occasion may require. The inward and spiritual signification is exactly the same as that of circumcision, which is spoken of as the "circumcision of the heart;" that is, regeneration and sanctification by the cleansing power of the Holy Spirit: and the Jews were taught, by John's use of baptism, that their outward advantages would never qualify them to enjoy the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom, except their hearts were washed from the love and pollution of sin, since they were by nature polluted, born in sin; and "the children of wrath," even as the Gentiles were.

Were baptized. (6) Ἐβαπτίζοντο.—Βαπτιζω is derived from βαπτω, to dip or immerse; (Luke 16:24. John 13:26. Rev. 19:13.) but is not synonymous with it; as the use of the word and its derivatives clearly shows. (20:22,23. Mark 7:4. 10:38, 39. Luke 3:16. 11:38. 12:50. Acts 1:5. Heb. 9:10.) 'It is taken more largely for any kind of washing, rinsing, or cleansing, even where there is no dipping at all.' Leigh. The word was adopted from the Greek authors, and a sense put upon it by the inspired writers, according to the style of scripture, to signify the use of water in the sacrament of baptism, and in many things of a spiritual nature, which stood related to it. Some indeed contend zealously, that baptism always signifies immersion; but the use of the words baptize, and baptism, in the New Testament, cannot accord with this exclusive interpretation. On the other hand, some, arguing perhaps too much from modern habits, have been sufficiently decided for the opposite interpretation. But the writer, after many years' consideration and study, has above given the outline of his own conclusions: and would only add, that vastly too much eagerness and acrimony have been employed in disputes on the subject; and far too little attention to the instruction suggested by this ordinance, and to the practical improvement which might be made of the administration of it, for the benefit of all concerned, both at the time and afterwards.—In Jordan.] Ἐν Ἰορδάνῃ.—The various ways in which the prepositions ἐν and εἰς, which are employed on this subject, are rendered in English in our authorized version on other subjects, must convince every one who examines it, that no weight can be laid upon them in controversial discussions; though the sound of the words may influence a mere English reader.

V. 7—10. The Pharisees were the strictest sect of the Jews, and made the greatest profession of religion: and the most reputable of their scribes and elders belonged to it. Some of them seem to have been decent formalists of moral character, but inflated with spiritual pride, and full of contempt of others. They laid the chief stress on external observances, often in minute matters, and according to their own traditions and inventions; so that, neglecting the weightier matters of the moral law, and the spiritual meaning of the legal ceremonies, they dealt largely in ostentatious austerities and mortifications. But others of them were the most detestable hypocrites imaginable, who made their reputation for extraordinary sanctity the cloak of exorbitant avarice, and the occasion for enormous oppression and iniquity.—The Sadducees were the scorning infidels of the time: they professed to receive some parts of the sacred writings, and to reject others; but they paid no proper regard to any of them. They did not believe the resurrection of the dead: and, as they did not allow the existence of angels, or spirits, they could not hold the immortality of the soul, or the future state of retribution; nay, it is hard to conceive, how they could believe the being of a God. Some of them, at least, seem to have been mere philosophizing atheists; and the rest downright skeptics, who treated every thing relating to God and eternity, as doubtful and disputable, and consequently with a contemptuous indifference.—Considering all the rewards promised in the law as referring to this world, they counted prosperity a proof of the divine favour, and poverty or distress an evidence of a man's being accursed of God; and thus they pretended, that to relieve the indigent and miserable was an attempt to counteract God's purposes, and therefore sinful. A very convenient opinion for a hard and selfish heart!—It is not clear, whether transient convictions, or a regard to reputation, brought these Pharisees and Sadducees to desire John's baptism; but they evidently came with wrong views, and an improper disposition. The Sadducees were as proud of their superior discernment, as the Pharisees of their superior sanctity; and with as little reason: but neither of them were prepared, by repentance and humiliation before God, to welcome the mercy and spiritual blessings of the Messiah. Instead, therefore, of sanctioning their characters, or courting their favour, John plainly, and even roughly, addressed them as a "generation of vipers," a race of subtle, designing men, of poisonous principles and practice, dangerous to all around them, the genuine children of the old serpent, the most hopeless part of the nation. (Marg. Ref. q.) He inquired of them with astonishment, "Who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" No doubt they deserved the wrath of God, which was about to come on the nation in this world, and on all unbelievers in the future and eternal state: but it could hardly be expected that such hypocrites and infidels would think of fleeing from it, without some extraordinary warning. Was this warning therefore from God? Or was it only from man? If, however, they truly repented, they might be admitted to his baptism: but then they must "bring forth fruits meet for repentance," in humility, meekness, patience, faith, love, equity, truth, mercy, and every good work; in newness of life proceeding from newness of heart; else the outward sign would be of no advantage to them. (Notes, Luke 3:7—14.) And they must not take encouragement, or any longer glory, because they were the descendants of faithful Abraham: for though the promises were made to him and to his Seed, yet God could raise up children to Abraham from the very stones before their eyes, or from the poor Gentiles, whom they equally disregarded; seeing all believers would be acknowledged as the spiritual seed of Abraham, and made heirs according to the promise. Instead, therefore, of expecting to appropriate the blessings of the Messiah's reign, because of their descent from Abraham, they must observe, that all these distinctions were about to be abolished; God was about to come into his vineyard, and to lay the axe to the root of every tree; and all, without exception, which did not bring forth the good fruits of a sober, righteous, and godly life, the "fruits meet for repentance," would be cut down, and cast into the fire, without regard to external privileges, except as these tended to aggravate their guilt and condemnation.—'Nothing stoppeth up the way of mercy and salvation against us, so much as the opinion of our own righteousness.' Beza. And next to this, perhaps, the opinion, that the gospel is a mild dispensation, making allowance for sin in those who profess it, and not requiring that strict holiness which was before demanded, is the most fatal. 'Abraham sits next the gates of hell, and doth not permit any wicked Israelite to go down into it.' Talmud. Do not many Christians seem to countenance a similar opinion, concerning those who are of their sect, or zealously contend for their sentiments? And is not this the case among Protestants, as well as among Papists?

V. 11, 12. John baptized the people with water, calling them to repentance, and making baptism their outward profession of it, and the avowed beginning of a new life. But Jesus, who came after John in order of time, but was immensely superior to him in dignity, authority and excellency, insomuch that John was not worthy to loose, or carry, his sandals, or to perform the lowest menial service for him, would baptize them "with the Holy Ghost and with fire." The descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost in the form of fiery tongues lighting on the apostles, with the effects produced on their minds and by their ministry, was a remarkable fulfilment of this prediction: yet this baptism "by the Holy Spirit and by fire," was vouchsafed comparatively to few of those who believed in Christ; but the language of John evidently denotes a general benefit. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Note, Acts 1:4—8.) —The Saviour, whose forerunner John was, would communicate to his disciples the divine Sanctifier, as purifying water, to wash away their internal pollutions: and as refining fire, to consume all their dross and the remains of their corrupt affections; to kindle in their hearts the holy flame of divine love and zeal; to illuminate their minds with heavenly wisdom, and to convert their whole souls into his own pure and holy nature. At the same time, to use another emblem, he would come to his visible church, which then consisted of a few believers mingled with many hypocrites and wicked persons, as the husbandman to his heap of threshed corn,—with his fan in his hand: and as the husbandman, easily and exactly, separates between the wheat and the worthless chaff, by winnowing the heap; so Christ, by his doctrine, his convincing Spirit, his omniscience, his providential dispensations, and at the last judgment, would exactly separate believers from unbelievers. And, as the husbandman gathers the wheat into his granary, and burns up the worthless chaff; so would Christ take care of believers, and execute vengeance on unbelievers. This immediately related to the reception of the pious Jews into the Christian church, and the terrible judgments about to be executed on the rejected Jewish nation; but it is equally applicable to the constant tendency of the gospel, and to the final condition of the righteous and the wicked. The expression "unquenchable fire" as fully proves that the wicked will never be released from the place of torment, as "their worm that never dieth" does that they will never be annihilated. (Marg. Ref. i—n. Notes, Mark 9:43—50.)

V. 13—15. After John had, during some time, exercised his ministry, Jesus came to be baptized by him. Being free from sin, he could not repent; and he needed no forgiveness, regeneration, or newness of life. He was not capable of those ends of baptism for which it was administered to others, but he would honour it as the ordinance of God; and he would use it as a solemn introduction to his most sacred work and offices, of which John's testimony, the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him, and the voice from heaven, were so many notifications. John, being aware of his divine dignity and excellence by immediate revelation, (Note, John 1:30—34.) hesitated to comply with this proposal; declaring that he needed to be baptized of Christ with the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and to be purged by him from his sins; and he could not but be surprised that Jesus should come for this purpose to him, who was his servant and a poor sinful man. But Jesus, allowing the truth of his words, intimated that it was proper that he should permit it to be so; "for," says he, "it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." We never find that Jesus spake of himself in the plural number; and it must therefore be allowed that he meant John also, and all the servants of God in a subordinate sense. It became Christ, as our Surety and our example, perfectly "to fulfil all righteousness:" and it becomes us to walk in all the commandments and ordinances of God, without exception; and to attend on every divine institution, according to the meaning and intent of it, as long as it continues in force. Thus far Christ's example is obligatory: but as John's baptism, not being exactly the same as Christian baptism, is no longer in force, the example only proves that Christian baptism should be honoured and attended on. Controverted points, however, cannot thus be settled. Christ's example does not bind us to do exactly as he did: for he was circumcised, kept the Passover, and observed the seventh day Sabbath, according to the dispensation under which he lived: but we are not required to do these things.

It becometh. (15) Πρεπον εστιν. 1 Cor. 11:13.—Πρεπω. Eph. 5:3. 1 Tim. 2:10. Tit. 2:1. Heb. 2:10. 7:26.

V. 16, 17. All other persons whom John baptized "confessed their sins;" but Jesus "went up straightway from the water." And immediately while he was praying, (Note, Luke 3:21,22.) "the heavens were opened;" and the Holy Spirit "descended like a dove," the emblem of purity, gentleness, and love; and "lighted upon him," probably both in the form, and with the hovering motion, of a dove. This extraordinary appearance was seen by John, as well as by our Lord, but it is not said that any of the people were present. (Note, John 1:30—34.)—This visible descent of the Spirit upon Christ was a token of his being endued with his sacred influences without measure, to qualify him as man, for every part of his mediatorial work, and to be communicated to his people from him as the head of the church. (Marg. Ref. x.)—At the same time a voice was heard from heaven, God the Father himself acknowledging Jesus as his beloved Son, in whose person, character, righteousness, and mediation he was well pleased, and fully satisfied. And thus it was intimated that those who would find acceptance with the Father, must hear, believe, and obey his beloved son, and ask all blessings in his name and for his sake.—At the baptism of our Lord, there was a manifestation of the three persons in the sacred Trinity, acting in their proper relations, according to the economy of our redemption. The Father appointing and sealing the Son to be the Mediator; the Son solemnly accepting the designation, and entering upon his work; and the Holy Spirit descending on him, as through his mediation communicated to his people, to apply his salvation to their souls. —'It is worthy of remark, what an assemblage of circumstances present themselves to our notice on opening the New Testament; all suited to fix our attention, and raise our expectations, respecting the extraordinary character to whom we are about to be introduced. Here, as in every part of the gospel, facts are simply related, without any studied remarks to awaken our attention: but what facts are they! In the small compass of the first three chapters, we have the genealogy of Jesus traced back to David and Abraham; the miraculous conception; the repeated interposition of angels; the wise men conducted to the scene of these transactions by an extraordinary star; the fulfilment of prophecies traced in each circumstance; a forerunner, (himself the subject of repeated prophecy,) coming to prepare the way of the Lord; and finally, the miraculous appearance, and the voice from heaven, at the baptism of Jesus, announcing him to be "the beloved Son of God." What impressions are these things suited to make! Yet they are introduced, apparently, without any design on the part of the writer to strike or to affect: they come in of course, as facts which the truth of history required to be related.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The most eminent and useful servants of God often grow up in retired situations, and exercise their ministry in places remote from the busy scenes of life: but wherever stationed, God will bring those to attend on them whom he purposes to save by their labours; and he can as easily convene large congregations in the desert, as in populous cities. —The world at large, with all its inhabitants, is "the kingdom of the wicked one;" except as some are translated by the grace of God, "from the power of darkness into the kingdom of his dear Son." And all these will soon be received into the realms of felicity, where their King now reigns in glory: but those who remain strangers or enemies to this deliverance, and consequently subjects of Satan, will have their portion with their prince in the region of darkness and despair. This kingdom of God and heaven is "come nigh to us;" but unless it be set up in our hearts, we shall not enjoy its blessings; nor can we understand the nature, excellency, and glory of it, except we be broken in spirit with godly sorrow, and humbled in true repentance; taught to hate sin and to long for deliverance both from its punishment and pollution. The preachers of salvation, therefore, must introduce their message of rich mercy and plenteous redemption, by "the ministration of condemnation," and by showing sinners the nature and necessity of "repentance, and of works meet for repentance." Thus prophets and apostles, as well as John the Baptist, "prepared the ways of the LORD," and led sinners to welcome his salvation and submit to his authority: and thus even the King of glory, when he humbled himself to be "a Preacher of righteousness," prepared the way for erecting his spiritual kingdom, and for rendering himself precious to the hearts of his hearers.—Modern deviations then from this good old way, will not be found improvements upon it: and if repentance were more fully and clearly preached, "The Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," would not so often be pointed out in vain, nor would men so much neglect or pervert the gospel, as they do where this is slightly and superficially attended to.—They who preach repentance, the mortification of worldly lusts, and the renunciation of worldly interests and indulgences, will commonly have success, in some measure proportioned to the degree in which they exemplify their own doctrine. And if they seem nearly as much alive to the pursuit of wealth, or as desirous of the pleasures and decorations of life as other men, their declamations will have little influence; for their hearers will consider their conduct as a comment on their sermons. Nor can ministers in general be sufficiently independent, to be faithful to all men and all cases, unless they learn to be content with mean accommodations, and to be frugal and simple in their expenses. Indeed, it is no disgrace, but an honour, to the servant of God, to appear as a poor man, and as willing to be poor, in his attire, his table, his furniture, and every thing belonging to him. Those who have not superior wisdom, piety or holiness, may want external appendages to preserve them from neglect and contempt: but "the man of God," who is devoted to him and "furnished for every good work," has a more valuable distinction, and needs them not.—But how small a portion of those who attend on the most faithful preachers, become the true disciples of Christ! Many are attracted by novelty, or go because others do; and many are brought under transient convictions. They attend on divine ordinances, make confessions of sin, and profess to be disciples; but they have not the true repentance and living faith of real Christians, and in time of temptation they fall away.

V. 7—12. The servant of God must not judge of men, according to outward rank, profession, or reputation; but according to their characters, estimated by the rule of scripture. None are further from the kingdom of heaven, than formalists, who are proud of their own supposed goodness; and infidels, who are elated with an idea of their superiority to vulgar prejudices, and of their pre-eminent knowledge and sagacity. Little do such men suspect that they are much more emphatically "the children of the wicked one," and better serve his cause than the vilest of the profligates whom they disdain; or that they are likely to receive still deeper damnation. Loud, indeed, are their clamours of bigotry, uncharitableness, and fanaticism, when they read such declarations: yet they will find them true, except (which is not likely) they should take warning, and "flee from the wrath to come;" and let it be carefully observed, that all the miseries, and multiplied triumphs of death, which are the effects of God's displeasure against the sins of men, are entirely distinct from, and not worthy to be compared with "the wrath to come." Happy are they who take the alarm, and flee for their lives, without loitering, or turning aside: for whether they have heretofore been Pharisees, Sadducees, or publicans, they will not be rejected by the gracious Saviour. Yet, unless we "bring forth fruits meet for repentance," our profession of Christianity will no more avail us than the relation of the unbelieving Jews to Abraham profited them. The Lord is able to raise up true disciples to Christ, from among those who have not yet heard of his name; and he will never spare any man who works iniquity, (nay, who does not work righteousness,) on account of his creed, his sect, or his forms of godliness; for "now is the axe laid to the root of the trees, and every tree," not only which bringeth forth bad fruit, but "which bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire."—But our hearts cannot be made productive of this good fruit, except the regenerating spirit of Christ graft the good word of God on them. "No outward forms can make us clean:" no ordinances, by whomsoever administered, or after whatever mode, can supply the want of "the baptism of the Holy Ghost, and of fire;" this alone can produce that purity of heart, and those exalted and holy affections, which uniformly "accompany salvation." All professed Christians, who are destitute of this inward seal of the covenant, are but chaff amidst the wheat; and our Lord has "his fan in his hand, and he will throughly purge his floor." He employs various methods in this world for that purpose; but the grand separation will be in the day of judgment, when "he will gather the wheat into his garner, and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

V. 13—17. The most eminent saints have always been the most humble; they have had the most abasing thoughts of themselves, and the most exalted apprehensions of the glory and excellency of Christ; they have felt their need of his atoning blood, and sanctifying spirit, more than others, and have thought the meanest place in his service too high and honourable for them. We need no further proof of this, when we hear him, who "was filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb," and who was "the greatest of all that had been born of woman," declare himself unworthy to bear Emmanuel's shoes. Let us compare and contrast his character and language with those of self-sufficient Pharisees and Sadducees, ancient and modern; and of those especially, who spend their lives in derogating from the honour of Christ, that they may exalt themselves. But "before honour is humility:" yea, the Lord honours those who honour him; and whilst we admire the self-abasement of our Surety, "in fulfilling all righteousness" for our justification, even when it made him appear as if he had been a sinner; let us learn to copy his example, and to honour God, by worshipping him in all his institutions; and to seek his grace in the use of all appointed means. Thus we may wait for the "supply of the Spirit of Christ," to make us fruitful in the works of righteousness, to evince our union with him, and to be in us "the Spirit of adoption, witnessing with our spirits, that we are the children of God," accepted in "his beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased." But let us remember, that the Spirit of Christ resembles the gentle, loving dove, and not any fierce bird of prey; furious contests therefore cannot spring from his influence; nay, they banish him from our hearts and assemblies, they weaken the evidences of our adoption, and mar our comfort. "For the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance;" and by abounding in these, we best glorify the God of our salvation, to whose service we were devoted,

CHAPTER IV.

Christ, being led by the Spirit into the wilderness, fasts forty days; is tempted by the devil; overcomes him by the word of God, and is ministered to by angels, 1—11. He dwells at Capernaum, and fulfils a prophecy of Isaiah, by preaching in Galilee, 12—17. He calls Peter, Andrew, James, and John, to follow him, 18—22. He teaches in the synagogues, and heals the diseased; so that, his fame being spread abroad, he is followed by great multitudes, 23-25.

THEN [a]was Jesus led up [b]of the Spirit into the wilderness, [c]to be tempted of the devil.

2 And when he had [d]fasted forty days and forty nights, [e]he was afterward an hungered.

3 And when [f]the tempter came to him, he said, [g]If thou be the Son of God, [h]command that these stones be made bread.

4 But he answered and said, [i]It is written, [k]Man shall not live by bread alone, [l]but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

[Practical Observations.]

5 Then the devil [m]taketh him up into [n]the holy city, and setteth him [o]on a pinnacle of the temple,

6 And saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: [p]for it is written, [q]He shall give his angels charge concerning thee: and in their hands they shall bear thee up, [r]lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone.

7 Jesus said unto him, [s]It is written again [t]Thou shalt not tempt the LORD thy God.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. Good chronologists compute, that Christ was born four years before the time of the era from which we at present calculate. The chapters are here, however, dated according to the vulgar era; and as he was thirty years of age at his baptism, that event is dated after Christ twenty-six, and the computation is proceeded with on the same principle, as far as the date of events can be ascertained.

V. 1, 2. After the glorious things recorded in the close of the foregoing chapter, we might have expected that Jesus would be openly acknowledged as the Messiah, by the whole Jewish nation; but a very different scene here opens to our view. Immediately after the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him, "he was led up by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil." He might be disposed for retirement, in order to pour out his soul in prayer and praise, and by fasting and holy exercises to prepare for his most arduous work; yet was he especially led forth by the Spirit, to conflict with the devil, the false accuser, the adversary of God and man. Many expositors think that this took place in a desert, near Jordan, within the promised land; and tradition favours the opinion: yet it is more probable that it was in the wilderness of Sinai, where Moses, and after him Elijah, had fasted forty days and nights. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, Mark 1:12,13.) Christ went forth to be tempted; as our Surety, our Champion, our David, he went to meet that great "Goliath who had" so long "defied the armies of the living God," and had never found one able wholly to prevail against him; and in his success the interests of all his people were involved. Satan assaulted the first Adam in paradise, and prevailed with him to eat the forbidden fruit, when he might without offence have regaled his appetite with rich variety; but "the second Adam" met the enemy in a howling wilderness, and thus gave him his full advantage, and he was pleased to sustain, by miracle, an entire fast of forty days and nights, that nothing might interrupt the interesting conflict. Satan could not but know that this was "the Holy One of God," and for what end he came into the world; but from that furious enmity, with which he constantly opposes the purposes of God, though always baffled, he was desirous of assaulting him. Perhaps he had some presumptuous expectation of success; he knew that, as Man, Jesus was like unto us in all things, except sin; and if he could gain the least advantage, the whole plan of redemption would be frustrated. As he had, therefore, put it into the heart of Herod to attempt murdering Jesus in his infancy, so he now attempted to draw him into sin; and if he could not do this, yet he should have the hellish pleasure of giving him uneasiness. For our Lord "suffered being tempted:" in proportion to his perfect holiness, his soul would be the more distressed by the detestable suggestions of the enemy; and that which preserved him from defilement, exposed him to suffer: but to this he willingly submitted, that he might have an experimental sympathy with his people, under their temptations, and be able to succour them.—It is probable, that Satan renewed his temptations, from time to time, during the whole forty days, continually interrupting Christ's holy meditations with his hateful suggestions; (Luke 4:2.) but we are not informed of what passed during this season. After this long suspension, his appetite of hunger again returned, in a place where no sustenance could be procured by ordinary means; and probably no trial is more acute than that of extreme hunger, without prospect of relief. The tempter, therefore, chose this crisis for his most subtle and vehement assault.

V. 3, 4. Satan seems to have before acted as an invisible tempter, suggesting thoughts to the mind of Christ, as he does to those of his people; but now he assumed a visible form, not terrifying, but as a friend, perhaps professing to be "an angel of light." In this assumed character, he proposed to him, that if he were, indeed, "the Son of God, he should command the stones before him to be made bread." The subtlety of the tempter appears in the plausibility of the temptation. He did not urge him to create a feast for indulgence, but merely to change a stone into a loaf for his necessity, and to show that he was indeed the Son of God: and where was the harm of this, when he was ready to perish with hunger? Some think that the temptation was chiefly intended to make him question, whether he were indeed the Son of God: but this seems rather to have been assumed, as a kind of principle, on which other things were to be grounded; in something of the same manner, as when Eve was tempted by the serpent: and the same temptation is implied, "Ye shall be as gods," self-sufficient and independent. (Notes, Gen. 3:1—5.) He might here address Christ, as in a way of surprise—'What! art thou the beloved Son of God, and left in this waste desert to perish with hunger! Can it be possible! Is this the love of the Father! Wait no longer on him for a supply, which has been too long delayed, and of which there is no prospect. The case is urgent, and the power inherent in thee; exert thyself and show thy divinity, by commanding these stones to become bread.' This seems to have been the tempter's meaning: but to work a miracle to satisfy the craving of the appetite, would have implied hard thoughts of God, distrust of his providence and promise, and a disposition to leave the direct path of duty, and to use improper means of relief; like him, who said, "This evil is of the LORD; why should we wait for the LORD any longer?" We must recollect that Christ, as Man, was bound to obey the whole law; and every thing, which would have been in the least sinful for us in similar circumstances, would have been inconsistent with the very end of his coming into the world. The gift of miracles, in Christ, was in many respects a talent; and it was necessary, while "he fulfilled all righteousness," and set us a perfect example in all other respects, that he should employ this talent wholly for the purposes for which it was intrusted; viz. to confirm his mission and doctrine, to honour the Father, and to do good to men; and not at all to accommodate or relieve himself. For this is the precise difference between holiness and selfishness, in the use of the various gifts of God. It would have been the duty of a prophet, in such a situation, to wait patiently, and not to attempt working a miracle for his own relief, without some immediate intimation from God; and therefore Jesus would by no means attend to such an insidious proposal; but answered the tempter by a plain text of Scripture. (Note, Deut. 8:3.) The life of man depends on God, and not on food; God can sustain life without food, but food cannot sustain life without his blessing. To rest upon his promise, and to obey all his precepts, and thus to commend our lives to his keeping; and to suffer any extremity, rather than break his commands, or question the truth of his word, by which alone our lives and souls are secured, and on which they must live, constitutes our duty. This reply, therefore, repelled the temptation, and the tempter was overcome by "the sword of the Spirit." The quotation here is almost verbatim from the Septuagint; but it likewise exactly agrees with the Hebrew text.

V. 5—7. The devil, finding Christ immoveably steadfast in confiding in his heavenly Father, changed his method of assault. He conveyed him (doubtless by his own permission, in whatever way it was effected) into Jerusalem, which had long been called "the holy city;" and there he placed him on a pinnacle of the temple, perhaps on the top of the high porch, or steeple, that was at the east end of it; which, as well as the other parts, was surrounded by a battlement, to prevent any from falling: (Deut. 22:8.) and then he proposed to him, being the Son of God, "to cast himself down from thence." This was a public situation, and he might thus at once prove himself the promised Messiah; and it would also, as the tempter meant to insinuate, be the highest evidence of his confidence in God. Our Lord had produced Scripture to refute the former temptation; the tempter therefore supported this with a quotation from the sacred oracles. (Note, Ps. 91:11,12.) Whether the words adduced were understood as a promise to believers, or a prophecy relating to Christ, Satan suggested, that they ensured his safety; for if angels were charged with believers, to keep them from dashing their foot against a stone; much more would the Son of God be borne up by them, that he should not be injured by the fall. But he omitted the words "in all thy ways," knowing that an ostentatious casting himself from this battlement was none of the ways marked out for Christ, (or for any believer,) in which he might depend on divine protection.—Satan could tempt Christ to cast himself down, but he could not cast him down, for his power was limited. Perhaps he presumed, that he should thus induce Jesus to terminate his own life; at least compliance with this proposal would have been a needless, nay, an ostentatious method of showing how entirely God protected him, and an unwarranted requisition of a miracle to be wrought in his preservation. Our Lord, therefore, answered the enemy by another quotation of scripture, (Deut. 6:16.) which plainly forbids men to tempt the Lord God.—Some indeed contend, that this expression denotes diffidence, rather than presumption, and they produce several texts to prove it; but the meaning in every place seems to be, 'putting the power, truth, and love of God to an unnecessary trial; refusing to believe him, without further evidence than he chooses to give; dictating to him what he should do; questioning whether he could do this or the other, and resolving not to be satisfied that he could unless he did; neglecting proper means, running into needless danger, making improper requisitions, expecting unwarranted interpositions.' Thus, if our Lord had cast himself from the temple, he would have demanded, as it were, a needless miraculous public attestation to his character as "The Son of God;" and have put himself into circumstances of extreme danger, in expectation of a divine interposition, for which in such a case he could have no warrant; and this would have been "to tempt the LORD," and a violation of the command in the plain meaning of it.—St. Luke mentions this temptation last; but St. Matthew seems to have observed the order of time, in his narration.—A pinnacle. (5) Το πτερυγιον, the pinnacle. (Note, 1 Kings 6:2,3.) The quotations in the sixth and seventh verses exactly agree with the LXX; except as in the former of them the order of the words is changed; but the LXX exactly translate the Hebrew.

V. 8—11. The devil seems at length to have despaired of success, by any covert, plausible temptation: he therefore resolved openly to make one bold effort, grounding all his hope of success on the vastness of the recompense, which he meant to propose as the price of transgression. To give the better colour to his artifice, he took the Lord Jesus to the top of an exceedingly high mountain, and thence "showed him the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them." This must have been an illusion upon the imagination, over which Satan seems to have peculiar influence: for it is naturally impossible that all the kingdoms of the world could be seen at once; as by far the greatest part of them must be beneath the visible horizon. They were, however, presented to the mind of Christ, as if he had seen them with his eyes, and fully beheld all the wealth, magnificence, and honour, which appear glorious in the eyes of men. And Satan impudently avowed, that all these were absolutely at his disposal; and that he was so pleased with Jesus, that he was ready to put him into immediate possession of them, provided he would do homage for them, by one single prostration, one transient act of worship.—Doubtless Satan is permitted to use worldly things as his baits, with which to allure his votaries; but nothing could be more audaciously false, than to pretend that God had receded from his providential government of the world, in order that the devil might absolutely dispose of it as he pleased; especially as he was addressing him, "by whom kings reign:" and nothing could be more arrogant, than to require the incarnate Son of God to worship him. Whatever disguise this ambitious spirit had before assumed, (for we suppose him to be the great leader of the whole army of apostate angels,) he was now made manifest, and his diabolical designs also: Christ therefore addressed him by his name, "Satan," the adversary of God and man, and commanded him to depart immediately; for it was written, "Thou shalt worship the LORD thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." (Marg. Ref. a.)—The Saviour in this spake as Man, to whom it was absolutely forbidden to worship any other than God only.—Thus the great enemy was baffled, and left the Redeemer; ceasing for a season to renew his temptations. And then holy angels came, as it were to congratulate him on his victory, to do him honour, and to minister to his wants.

Thou shalt worship, &c. (10) 'From these words, compared with other like scriptures, it appears that Christ is not a creature; because the worship and service due to God alone, cannot be duly given to a creature, that being to own him equal in dignity with God; and the sin of idolatry chiefly consisting in giving that worship to a creature which is due only to the God of heaven. And therefore religious adoration and service . . . cannot be given duly, or without idolatry to Christ, provided that he be only a creature. Seeing then God doth require, "that all men should worship the Son, even as they worship the Father;" and "when he brought the First-born into the world, said, Let all the angels of God worship him;" and seeing this is the character of Christians that they "serve the Lord Christ:" it is certain that he cannot be a creature only, but must be truly God.' Whitby.—Thou shalt worship.] Προσκυνησεις.—In both the texts where this command occurs, (Deut. 6:13. 10:20.) the LXX have 'Thou shalt fear (φοβηθηση) the Lord, &c.'

V. 12—17. Not long after John had baptized Christ, he gave offence to Herod the Tetrarch: and, being cast into prison, he terminated his ministry, and after some time ended his short but useful life. It is, however, evident that Jesus had entered upon his ministry, and become eminent, a considerable time before John was cast into prison. (Notes, John 1:29—51. 2:1—12. 3:22—36. 4:1—3.) But at that time he began to preach more fully and openly, in the northern part of the land. He had perhaps been at Jerusalem at some solemn feast, when this account was brought to him; and he immediately departed for Galilee; and then leaving his habitation at Nazareth, (Joseph perhaps being dead, as we read no more of him,) he took up his ordinary abode at Capernaum, a city upon the borders of the two lots assigned to the tribes of Zabulon and Nephthalim, upon the coast of the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias. This was done in order to fulfil a remarkable prophecy of Isaiah. (Notes, Is. 9:1,2.) Thus, in Galilee of the Gentiles, that is, bordering on the Gentiles, where such darkness had prevailed, that it was "the region of the shadow of death," the glorious light of the gospel sprang up and shone forth, when Jesus began to preach the same doctrine, which John had preached in another part of the land. (Notes, 3:1,2.) Stronger language could not be employed in describing even the deplorable ignorance of the Gentiles.—This part of Galilee was not far distant from Tyre; and Solomon had given Hiram, king of Tyre, twenty cities in that neighbourhood. (1 Kings 9:11.)

The people, &c. (16) The quotation is made by translating the Hebrew, with no variation, except the omission of a clause not immediately requisite for the Evangelist's argument; and substituting sitting for walking. It differs more from the LXX, but not materially.

V. 18—22. Jesus had a considerable time before this been acknowledged as the Messiah by Andrew and Peter; but it seems they had not been required to forsake their ordinary employments, and to follow him constantly, with a view to the ministry and apostleship. (Notes, John 1:35—42.) Simon and Andrew were partners, and were employed in casting their net; but Jesus called them to leave it and to follow him, and assured them they should be "fishers of men." They would be employed in bringing men out of the world and its vanities, to Christ and salvation, by means of the gospel: even as they had been in bringing the fishes out of the sea with their nets: and they would need the same kind of skill, self-denial, endurance of hardships, assiduity, regard to times and opportunities, and patience, which they had been used before to exercise. This call was accompanied with such power, that without delay they left all and followed him.—And, going on, he saw two other brethren who were diligently employed in another way; and at his call they left all, even their aged father, to follow Christ, trusting in Providence for a precarious subsistence in this new employment.—Zebedee probably was a disciple of Jesus, and seems readily to have acquiesced in the will of the Lord concerning his sons, though not called to this service, but allowed to continue in his former occupation.—The miraculous draught of fishes, related by St. Luke, probably took place about this time, either before or soon after the events here recorded. V. 23—25. Jesus, having procured these attendants, not from the schools or palaces of Jerusalem, but from the fishers-boats of Galilee, went about preaching the gospel in the synagogues, or places of worship, which were something like our parish churches. Wherever he went, he confirmed his divine mission by a variety of benevolent miracles, which were emblems of the healing efficacy of his doctrine, and the influences of the Spirit that accompanied it. So that his fame spread abroad into the adjacent region of Syria, as well as into all the parts of the land of Israel: multitudes therefore brought their sick unto him, and he healed them all, at the same time instructing them in the way of salvation. We shall have a better opportunity of discussing many subjects relating to these diseases, possessions, lunatics, &c. when we come to particular instances: only observing, that this beneficent display of our Lord's divine power, both marked the gracious design of his undertaking, and excited the attention of the people to his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. f, g, h—r.)—It should, however, be noticed, that persons possessed with devils, are here expressly distinguished from lunatics; and they could not then be exactly the same, as some skeptical learned men seem to think.—'It seems strange to find men at this distance of time questioning the truth of that which neither Pharisees nor Sadducees then doubted of, or ever did object against the pretensions of Christ and his apostles to cast out devils.' Whitby.—Gospel of the Kingdom. (23) Marg. Ref. h.—Lunatic. (24) Σεληνιαζομενους. 17:15.—(From σεληνη, the moon.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. Retirement, fasting, meditation, and devotion, are suitable preparations for the important work of the ministry; and they who are led 'by the Holy Spirit to take this office upon them,' will seek communion with God, and a blessing from him, in the use of every means of grace. Yet we must not yield to discouragement, if, when we thus seek to commune with God, we should be peculiarly assaulted by the temptations of the devil. That subtle enemy often leaves the negligent and slothful unmolested: but when we seek to glorify God and do good, or to enjoy communion with him, Satan will be sure to assault us as far as he is permitted: and the Lord is often pleased to permit him to do this, either to counterbalance our comforts, or to prove the reality and power of our grace. The enemy also knows how to avail himself of outward circumstances; and whether we be full or hungry, he can vary his temptations accordingly.—The Lord could, if he saw good, suspend the cravings of our appetites; but, as this is not his ordinary method, they are guilty of presumption who attempt such degrees of abstinence as render their appetites more unruly, and thus expose themselves to temptation: yet the trial of our faith and love sometimes consists in bearing patiently the cravings of nature, rather than remove them by committing the least sin.—Satan is too skilful to assault established believers, in the full exercise of faith and love, at the first, with temptations to evident and gross iniquities. He is most dangerous to them when most plausible, and when his temptations seem to be good and friendly hints, tending to something profitable without evident criminality. He often, in a very specious manner, tempts men to unbelief, or harasses their minds with groundless fears and perplexities. He suggests to the poor or afflicted, that if they were indeed the children of God, surely they would not be left to such sufferings, or to experience such straits; thus insinuating hard thoughts of God, as if he were unkind or unfaithful: or he excites them to affect a sort of independence even of God, by attempting, in a sinful manner, to supply their own wants. Sometimes he affrights the mind with gloomy prospects of still greater difficulties; and represents trusting in the Lord, with scrupulous conscientiousness, as leading to distress and ruin. By his emissaries, he persuades men that some compliances must be made and deviations admitted, or else they must starve: or he tries to imbolden them to venture on some convenient or gainful sin, because they are the children of God, and there is no danger of their being cast off for it. In these and numberless other ways, he tempts us to impatience, distrust, or sinful expedients of deliverance from trouble; and, in opposition to our principles, to prefer sin to suffering. And having a party within us, we too often listen to his soothing flatteries, and are induced to dishonour our profession, or at least to honour it less than we ought to do. But "the sword of the Spirit" is that warranted weapon which Satan cannot stand against; and it is our wisdom to answer all suggestions with, "Thus it is written." "Let God be true and every man a liar:" our dependence is wholly on the Lord: his word of promise is our stable support, his precept is our infallible rule. By these men live: and whilst we lean on an express promise, and obey the plain precept, we must be safe, whatever appearances may be against us. "Our Father knoweth what things we have need of," and sooner all nature shall recede from its course than any of his promises shall fail of accomplishment.

V. 5—7. When Satan sees men staying their hearts on God in steadfast faith, and adhering to their duty in the midst of difficulties, determined rather to suffer than to seek relief by sin, he can change his ground and tempt them to neglect proper means, or to thrust themselves uncalled into dangers and difficulties, expecting the Lord to help them out. Taking advantage of their reverence for the scripture, he knows how plausibly to support these suggestions by texts, which seem to give countenance to this unwarranted confidence. "The LORD will provide;" and therefore the believer needs not defraud, or break the sabbath, in order to a maintenance: but Satan will tempt him further to infer, that he may be negligent, improvident, or extravagant, and that even in this case God has engaged to provide for him.—The children of God shall be kept from final apostacy, and therefore they need not be dejected by the consciousness of their own weakness, or by the prospect of strong temptations: but the enemy will suggest that they need not watch and pray; that they may venture into perilous situations; that they may ostentatiously court difficulty, and thrust themselves into danger, and then expect their heavenly Father to preserve them.—Satan and his instruments have a peculiar advantage in such cases, by partial or distorted quotations of scripture, when the comfort or privilege is separated from the character or duty annexed. The believer shall be preserved "in all his ways;" but by keeping out of sight the concluding words, Christians are often seduced out of their way, and expect to be preserved in places and companies where they have no business: and many persons are deluded into a false persuasion that they are believers, by such mutilated quotations. But let all men beware of thus mangling scripture: and be upon their guard against those who produce part of a text, and leave out some emphatical words which contradict the end for which they quote it. Godly men may do this in the heat of argument, or through inattention: but they follow a hateful precedent, and it tends to great mischief, and is a powerful engine in the hands of those who oppose the truth.—Let us also recollect that the tempter has no objection to holy places as the scene of his assaults; nay, he often chooses them for the sake of plausibility: but he delights in high places, to which he would gladly exalt those of whose labours he is afraid, that he might cast them down with the more fatal fall; and he peculiarly urges men to presumption and ostentation.—The perversion of scripture made by numbers should not induce us to neglect it; but by plain texts, used in their obvious meaning, we must answer temptations grounded on its misapplication.—We should ever remember that we trust in the Lord, when we expect his protection in the path of duty; but tempt him, if we wilfully deviate from it, presuming on his care of us.

V. 8—11. The believer should not despond, if assaulted by the most horrible temptations to infidelity, blasphemy, suicide, or any other dreadful crime, as Christ himself was tempted to ambition, and even to worship the devil. The more such suggestions pain us, the less likely they are to defile us; even as bad language fails to pollute us, in proportion as it wounds our ears and grieves our hearts.—By long observation and deep penetration, our enemy knows how powerfully the prospect of authority, honour, and greatness, with such glories as the kingdoms of the earth contain, attract the minds of men. It was indeed a vain presumption in him to suppose that the holy heart of our divine Redeemer could be thus allured. But we are all by nature prone to seize on such supposed advantages; to forget that the Lord alone disposes of them; to mistake these illusions of the imagination for substantial good, and to render Satan any service which may be required as the price of obtaining them. Alas! we find but very few men who, in all instances, decidedly and with indignant abhorrence, silence every proposal of this kind. Yet "what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Conscious therefore of our weakness, we should pray that we may not be "led into temptation," and be thankful to be kept out of the way of it: for numbers, who seemed to run well, have given up religion for a very small portion of the world: and many believers have been greatly hindered and pierced with bitter anguish, by yielding to these alluring suggestions. (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) Let us then beware of covetousness and ambition; store our minds with the precious words of God; and remember to "worship the LORD, and serve him alone," and not attempt to divide our heart between him and Mammon, which will be as ruinous as more gross idolatry.—Where temptations are strong, and the evil proposed evident, we must not parley for a moment: for the soul that deliberates is already vanquished.—Whilst we admire the condescension and patience of the incarnate Son of God, in suffering himself to be conveyed from place to place by this foul fiend, that as our Surety he might conquer him, let us learn to copy his example, and to pursue his victories, taking encouragement from the consideration, that our exalted Redeemer 'knows what sore temptations mean,' and that "he suffered being tempted, that he might be able to succour them that are tempted." Let us observe the honourable issue of his conflict: how angels ministered to him, who refused Satan's counsel to supply his own wants; and how "all power in heaven and earth is given to him," who refused the proffer of "all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them." If we resist the devil he will flee from us, and the Lord will give his angels charge over us likewise: and if we refuse honours and preferments purchased by sin, we shall obtain a kingdom in heaven that cannot be moved. Let us then "fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life."

V. 12—25. Our services and trials are alike short. When one instrument is laid aside, the Lord calls forth others; and when such as have been useful are taken to their rest, we should redouble our diligence in the cause of God.—Those places are highly favoured, where the pure gospel is preached. Till that blessing is vouchsafed, the people "sit in darkness and the shadow of death." This was the case of the Jews, as well as the Gentiles; and is, even at this day, that of nominal Christians in very many places, as well as of Jews, Pagans, and Mohammedans: but when the word of truth is faithfully declared, they "see a great light:" may all such "walk in the light, as the children of the light;" and may that blessed light be vouchsafed to all the regions of the earth!—All who preach the gospel must deliver the same message, and call men to repentance, that they may share the blessings and bring forth the fruits of salvation.—Next to the duties of religion, honest industry is most valuable: they are more likely to become useful ministers of Christ, who have spent their youth in laborious, self-denying occupations, than they who, professing to be students, waste their time in worldly pleasures, and contracting habits of dissipation, sloth, delicacy, and self-indulgence: and even shepherds, husbandmen, or builders may stand as fair to take good care of the Lord's flock, husbandry, or building, as these fishers, to become "fishers of men;" provided he is pleased to call them to it. However, let none despise instruction, learning, or preparation for the ministry. Christ himself became the tutor of those whom he sent forth to preach his gospel; and having taught them heavenly wisdom from his own lips as well as by the Holy Spirit, he gave them the knowledge of languages by miracle, that they might be fully qualified for their work.—When he speaks to the heart, men leave all and follow him: and even the demand of parents, on our care and attention, is subordinate to his right to our services, and to be relinquished if he command.—When ministers are not employed in casting their nets, they should be occupied in mending them. and they will find work for all their time, and abundant need of patience and assiduity.—We do not now experience the Saviour's miraculous healing power in our bodies: but if we be cured by medicine, the praise is equally his due: and he is the Physician of our souls; and if we come to him and follow his directions, he will at length perfectly heal all our maladies.—We cannot draw others to attend the gospel by miracles of love; but if we abound in acts of ordinary charity, we shall recommend the truth: and perhaps many may, by these means, be induced to attend on that word, by which their souls will be healed of spiritual lunacy, and Satan dispossessed, "who now holds them captive at his will;" and thus the name of our God and Saviour will be glorified by us, and others have to bless him on our behalf.

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. At the close of the last chapter, we read, that the divine Redeemer was surrounded with multitudes, whose diseases he healed: here we find him instructing them in the great concerns of their souls. He "preached to them the gospel of the kingdom:" repentance was his first subject; and on this, as to men's need of it, and the effects which it produces, he enlarged in the following practical sermon, which is the longest public discourse of Christ that is recorded.—He had before preached in the synagogues, as he often did afterwards; but probably no building could contain the multitudes at this time assembled; and therefore he ascended a mountain. Being thus elevated above the people, he sat down according to the custom of the Jewish teachers, and in that posture he instructed them. Those disciples, whom he had called to a more constant attendance on him, seem to have sat next him, and the multitude around them. But the apostles were not at this time chosen; and they, who professed to believe in him as a teacher sent from God, are frequently called disciples: so that the interpretation must not be restricted, by an exclusive application to the case of his more constant attendants. Thus seated and surrounded, the divine Teacher, with the utmost solemnity, and so as to be heard by all the company, taught them as follows.—The expression "opened his mouth" seems intended to convey an idea of the peculiar gravity, deliberation, and distinctness of the Speaker, and of the importance of that which was spoken.

V. 3. (Notes, Luke 6:20—26.) Expositors generally observe, that these Beatitudes, as they are called, were calculated to rectify the mistaken notions and expectations of the Jews, respecting the Messiah's kingdom: but, as all their prejudices originated from those corrupt propensities, which were common to them with other men; so these maxims of heavenly wisdom are equally adapted to remove false notions of excellency, honour, and felicity, in other men of all nations and ages.—All men seek happiness: but none, except those who are taught by the Spirit of God according to his word, know in what it consists, or how it may be obtained and enjoyed. The beatitudes may therefore be considered as the Christian paradoxes; for they place happiness in such dispositions of mind, and in such circumstances, as men generally deem incompatible with it. All the declarations of scripture, showing who are the blessed, or happy, have reference to our state and character as sinners: but some point out those benefits, by which we become entitled to happiness; (Note, Ps. 32:1,2.) and others those dispositions, or that conduct, which are conducive to the enjoyment of it. (Marg. Ref.)—Such short aphorisms require peculiar care in explaining them: and they commonly admit of limitations, according to other parts of scripture. In general it may be observed, that the beatitudes do not refer to any natural tempers, which may bear some resemblance to those intended; but to holy dispositions, produced by divine grace, rectifying the obliquities of fallen nature: and that where one of them really exists, all the others do, though perhaps not equally prominent. In the first place Christ declares that "the poor in spirit" are happy. "Poverty of spirit" is very different from poverty in outward circumstances. Many poor persons are proud, ungodly, dishonest, and profligate, and far from happiness; while some of the rich are humble, pious, and holy, and therefore happy.—Voluntary poverty cannot be meant. 'It is assuredly the duty of all men, who would attain this bliss, to be "poor in spirit;" whereas it cannot be the duty of all Christians to turn monks and friars mendicant to this end: for then all other Roman Catholics must be excluded from the kingdom of heaven.... By "the poor in spirit" our Saviour understands the man of a true, humble, lowly spirit; this being the usual expression, by which the scriptures ... represent the humble man.... They who are thus poor in spirit are blessed, because their humility, rendering them teachable, submissive, contented, and obedient, prepares them to enter into Christ's kingdom; ... and seeing they who are thus holy shall be also happy, they must be also meet to enter into the kingdom of glory hereafter.' Whitby.—This is widely different from a mean, abject, and grovelling disposition; and implies much more than patience in poor and afflicted circumstances.—We are all poor in respect of God and heavenly things; destitute of righteousness, holiness, strength, and wisdom; deep in debt without any thing to pay; under condemnation, foolish, enslaved, helpless, polluted, and vile. Yet very few know this to be their case and character: and amidst all this deep poverty, men in general are of a haughty, self-sufficient, and independent spirit; which precludes them from obtaining relief, and being made partakers of "the unsearchable riches of Christ." Happy then is he who knows, or is willing to know, how poor he is; who feels his indigence, dependence, and unworthiness; who is humbled and ashamed before God, as a lost sinner, that cannot demand or purchase salvation, or do any thing towards it; but must be a supplicant, and a debtor to grace for it, and for all that pertains to it. If this man be rich, learned, or noble, his heart will be weaned from dependence on such distinctions, and rendered lowly, courteous, and affable; if poor, he will be patient, contented, and thankful. He is prepared for exercising repentance and faith in Christ; and will gladly welcome his salvation, and give up every thing, that he may enter "the kingdom of heaven." He has the temper of the kingdom, and is prepared for the obedience and privileges of it; and all the blessings of it are his, certainly, exclusively, and eternally; they are provided for such persons, and appropriated to them, and none but they value, seek, or enjoy them. They are therefore happy, in the earnest and the hope of heaven; and their humble and lowly frame of mind tends to a peaceful enjoyment of life, and to confidence in God, communion with him, and the participation of the consolations of his Holy Spirit.

V. 4. The next blessing is, by the Lord Jesus, declared to belong to those that mourn; not those who have mourned, but those who are mourning. The world deems the gay, the dissipated, the jovial, and the prosperous, happy; and men turn aside from religion as a misery, because of the mourning connected with it. The Jews also expected nothing but festivity and carnal rejoicing, under the reign of the Messiah; but when he came, he pronounced the mourners happy.—All kinds of mourning cannot be intended, "for the sorrow of the world worketh death:" many are afflicted, and grow hardened under it; many "sorrow as men without hope," and spend their lives in rebellious murmurs, and die of vexation, or become their own executioners. The mourning which springs from "poverty of spirit," brokenness of heart, and tenderness of conscience, must especially be meant. A serious, considerate disposition, a readiness to recollect, confess, and be sorry for sin, with the "godly sorrow that worketh" true "repentance;" habitual watchfulness over the present temper and conduct, as well as a frequent humble recollection of past offences, producing remorse of conscience and self-abhorrence; a continual dependence on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus for acceptance; and an application for his sanctifying Spirit to cleanse away the remaining evil that is mourned over, seem primarily intended. But afflictions, and frequent mourning under the Lord's correcting rod, as far more salutary than prosperity, as pledges of his love, and means of humiliation and sanctification, are included: which, when they are properly submitted to and improved, tend to blessedness. And finally, a disposition to sympathize in the sorrows and troubles of our fellow Christians, and fellow sinners, must also be meant.—Such mourners as these are happy; their very tears and sighs have pleasure mixed with them, and prepare them for consolation: they shall be comforted with a sense of pardoning mercy, and with peace, hope, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and thus they shall anticipate the everlasting consolation prepared for them, when "God shall wipe all tears from their eyes." (Marg. Ref. Note, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O.—Notes, Is. 25:6. Rev. 7:13—17, v. 17.)

Shall be comforted.] Παρακληθησονται. (Hence Παρακλητος the Comforter.) The verb is often rendered exhort, as well as comfort. It means encouraging exhortation, encouragement exciting to exertion.

V. 5. Humiliation before God, indifference about the world, sorrow for sin, and a succession of trials and afflictions, soften the heart, and render it meek, that is, gentle, forbearing, forgiving, teachable, and submissive: which seems to be the disposition intended in this beatitude. There is a constitutional quietness of spirit, springing from love of ease, from defect in sensibility and firmness, and from the predominancy of other passions, which should be carefully distinguished from holy meekness. The natural temper is timid and pliant, easily deterred from good, and persuaded to evil; it leads to criminality in one extreme, as impetuosity of spirit does in another; it is often found in ungodly men; and it sometimes forms the grand defect in the character of pious persons, as in the case of Eli, and of Jehoshaphat. Divine grace operates in rendering such men more firm, resolute, and vigorous; as it does in rendering men of an opposite temper more yielding and quiet. The "meekness," to which the blessing is annexed, is not constitutional, but gracious; and men of the most vehement, irascible, and implacable dispositions, by looking to Jesus, through the grace of God, learn to curb their anger, to cease from resentment, to avoid giving offence by injurious words and actions, to make concessions, and forgive injuries. They become gradually more teachable, guidable, patient of counsel and contradiction, and calm in their spirit and conduct, from a principle of conscience, and by faith and prayer.—Whatever a man's previous disposition may have been, this meekness, which has regard both to the authority of the law and to the grace of the gospel, entitles him to the blessing. The temper itself is that of happiness: submission, resignation, peace, and love are its essence; contention, murmurs, and a thousand mischiefs and miseries are avoided by it: and it is said that "the meek shall inherit the earth." This, as it stands in the Old Testament, (Note, Ps. 37:10,11.) is spoken with reference to the promised land, the type of heaven; of which this meekness proves the possessor an heir, and for which it forms an essential qualification. But it also implies that the meek, however poor in the world, have more actual comfort than any other persons; as if the whole of it were their inheritance. They are more beloved and respected in their families and connexions; and are commonly left more undisturbed by their neighbours, they have more peace of conscience, tranquillity of mind, communion with God, and consolation from his Spirit, than other men: and facts in general contradict the declamations of those, who contend that such a temper and conduct will expose a man to intolerable injuries and evils in the world.—Abraham is called the "heir of the world:" and all believers are his children; and if "Christ be ours," all things are ours, both in this world and the next. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. The appetites of hunger and thirst, if not satisfied, are universally felt to be most craving and uneasy: they cannot be amused, bribed, or put off, with any other object than meat and drink; and this must be had, if possible, at any price, and by any hardship or peril. The desire of riches, honours, pleasures, knowledge, &c. when very vehement, are often described by metaphors taken from this; which denote both the eagerness of men in seeking, and their pleasure in obtaining, the desired object. But those who hunger and thirst after these things, can only obtain a temporary gratification, and are liable to eternal dissatisfaction. They alone are happy, "who hunger and thirst after righteousness:" that is, after God, and his favour, his image, and the holy felicity to be enjoyed in his service; who know the nature, excellency, and value of such blessings; who choose and seek them in the first place; who subordinate all other interests and pleasures to them; who will not put up with any thing short of them; who value every thing in proportion as it tends to the acquirement of them; who are dissatisfied with every attainment hitherto made; who are more grieved, that they are not more holy, than because they are poor, sick, or neglected; and who long above all things for perfect holiness and happiness in the favour and service of God. The new covenant is so constituted, that persons of this character cannot fail to seek and find the righteousness, after which they hunger and thirst: for the Holy Spirit, who excited this spiritual appetite, will lead them to Christ, that it may be satisfied: they will accept of his salvation, and receive from his fulness of grace; they will obtain a measure of the desired felicity on earth; and when all others will be torn from the objects of their choice, then, and not before, they "will be filled;" that is, as firmly established in the enjoyment of the divine love, and as entirely perfected in holiness, as they can desire: and this shall continue for ever; "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more." (Rev. 7:16.)—'The righteousness here mentioned is by some thought to be "the righteousness of faith," by which we, being justified, or freed from the guilt of sin, have peace with God: and this undoubtedly is a first matter of our spiritual thirst and hunger; but yet I think this cannot be the proper import of the words: 1. Because he word . . . righteousness bears no such sense in the gospel, but only in the epistles of St. Paul: 2. Because the Jews, to whom Christ speaks, had no idea of this righteousness, no apprehension that their Messiah was to die, and much less that they should be justified by his death: and therefore had Christ spoken of this righteousness, none of them could have understood his meaning.' Whitby.—It is not necessary to give an unreserved approbation to every clause in this quotation, in order to perceive that the general argument is conclusive, against this systematical interpretation of the beatitude, and against a similar explanation of some other passages in our Lord's discourses.

Shall be filled.] Χορτασθησονται. 'Satisfied, so as to desire nothing more.' (15:33,37. Gr.) It is derived from χορτος, grass, or herbage: and it is a figure taken from cattle in a good pasture, fed till they are satisfied and graze no longer.

V. 7. Connected with the preceding holy tempers, is that of mercy, or compassion, tenderness, and love: an aversion to every thing harsh, cruel, oppressive, or injurious; a propensity to pity, alleviate, or remove the miseries of mankind; an unwillingness to increase personal emolument or indulgence, by rendering others uneasy; a willingness to forego personal ease, interest, or gratification, to make others comfortable and happy: this seems the general meaning of the word merciful. —There is, however, a natural propensity of this kind, which should be carefully distinguished from the gracious disposition. This is not expansive, habitual, general: it is profuse to some, and cruel to others; it does not spring from proper motives, it is not directed to proper ends, nor governed by any regard to the divine law; it is often joined with impiety, injustice, excessive indulgence, and even tyranny, in other parts of a man's conduct; and in short, it is a sort of instinct, which is stronger in some men than others, and has no connexion with true religion. But the mercy to which the blessing is annexed, has respect to the authority, law, and glory of God, and to the grace of the gospel; it is learned by looking to the cross of Christ, and the mercy of God to sinners through him; it is uniform in its exercise, and seeks the good both of men's bodies and souls; it extends to the vile, the injurious, and the obscure, and to every one of the human species, however distinguished, as far as he falls under its sphere of action. It is connected with humility, faith, self-denial, equity, piety, and universal conscientiousness; and it induces a man, from love to God and hope in his mercy, to love, compassionate, and do good to all men, as he has time and opportunity: not allowing himself to injure any; but wishing and praying for the happiness of those whom he cannot reach or help.—Such persons are happy, for they shall "obtain mercy." All are sinners, and need mercy: these are penitent, believing sinners, and are interested in the mercy and grace of the covenant. The Lord will compassionate and be kind to them, according to their conduct towards their brethren; they shall be pardoned, supported, and comforted, through life and in death; and then shall enjoy "the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." But, on the contrary, "they shall have judgment without mercy, who have showed no mercy." —Even in this world, the exercise of mercy and beneficence constitutes one of the most delightful employments, of which our nature is capable; as they best know, who have the most decidedly made the experiment. (Marg Ref.)

Obtain mercy.] Ελεηθησονται. From the same root as ελεημονες. They pity, and they shall be pitied; they forgive and relieve, and they shall be forgiven and relieved.

V. 8. Men are apt to think those happy, who have it in their power to gratify every ambitious, covetous, or sensual inclination, without restraint or limitation: and probably the carnal Jews expected abundant indulgences of this kind under the reign of their Messiah. But, on the contrary, Jesus pronounces those happy, who are "pure in heart;" in whose souls, all carnal, sensual, and sinful desires are so mortified and subdued, that they do not seek the gratification of them; who are inwardly replenished with holy inclinations and affections, and influenced by the fear and love of God, in their habitual conduct. The believer's understanding is in part purified from darkness, his judgment from error, his will from rebellion, his affections from enmity, avarice, pride, and sensuality; his memory and imagination from the depraved thoughts and recollections which once occupied them; and his leading aim is to glorify God, obey his will, enjoy his favour and do good. This is indeed imperfect in this world; but the remainder of sin and pollution forms his burden and grief, and the object of his detestation; which is one peculiar and distinguishing effect and evidence of purity of heart. In proportion as any one is purified through faith, he is prepared for discoveries of God to his soul on earth, and favoured with them: and when he shall be perfected in holiness, he shall with open face behold the manifested glory of God; and adore, admire, and be unspeakably happy in the beatific vision to all eternity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. The Jews expected a Messiah, who would lead them forth to war, revenge, victory, and dominion: and mighty warriors and conquerors have always been admired, and celebrated, and congratulated, as honourable and happy; though their mad ambition has rendered the earth a scene of misery, discord, and confusion. But our great Peace-maker pronounced the peace-makers happy; such as are peaceable in their own conduct, and labour to promote peace in families and communities; such as use their influence to prevent or terminate wars, law-suits, feuds, domestic broils, and religious controversies; such as do all in their power to promote the reconciliation of sinners unto God, and to induce them to live in harmony and peace with one another. These are happy persons, though they receive little thanks from the furious disputers either of the world, or of the church. They bear the image of God, and copy his example; they are evidently reconciled, regenerated, and adopted: he owns them as his children, and will before the whole world avow their relation to him: many will "call them the children of God" here, and all will know them to be so at last. They shall have much comfort in their loving endeavours on earth, and shall obtain eternal felicity in heaven; that is, if indeed they act from a regard to the authority, example, and glory of God, and to his reconciling love in Christ Jesus. (Notes, 1 Thes. 4:9 —12. Jam. 3:17,18. Comp. Col. 1:20. Jam. 3:18. Gr.)

V. 10—12. The Jews expected to be honoured and paid court to under the reign of the Messiah: and we all naturally annex the idea of happiness to honour, respect, and favour; and are apt to imagine that a conscientious conduct will certainly ensure them to us. But Christ declared those to be happy, "who were persecuted for righteousness' sake." If men suffer, under a profession of religion, for their crimes or follies, or for their obstinate attachment to unscriptural or anti-scriptural tenets and practices, without general conscientiousness, they cannot be included in this blessing. But when those who fear God, and rely on his mercy through Christ, suffer for conscience' sake; even though they may err in the matter for which they suffer, they must not be excluded: for they act from proper motives, and under a covenant of mercy. Yet the more evidently men suffer for adhering to the plain truths and precepts of the scripture, the more clearly are they interested in this blessing.—It is here taken for granted, that believers must meet with injurious treatment in this world. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:10—12.) The wicked hate the holy image of God, and those who bear it; his holy truth, and those who profess and preach it; his holy law, and those who obey and stand up for its obligation and authority; and his holy ordinances, and those who attend on them. They accuse true Christians of bigotry, spiritual pride, fanaticism, hypocrisy, sedition, misanthropy; they invent all kinds of calumnies of them, and fasten opprobrious names on them. If then we adhere to the truths, precepts, and ordinances of Christ, and refuse to comply with any thing contrary to our consciences; we must prepare to endure derision, reproach, slander, or more severe treatment, from ungodly men. But the kingdom of grace and glory belongs to those who, on such accounts, meet with and patiently endure persecution: they suffer for the sake of Christ and righteousness; and "all manner of evil is spoken of them falsely," because they belong to the Lord. Instead, therefore, of dejection and complaints, they should count themselves happy that the enemies of God see and hate his image in them: (Note, 1 Pet. 4:12—16) yea, they should rejoice and exult for joy, in the prospect of the great and glorious recompense which is prepared for them; remembering, that they are in this conformed to the most approved and honoured servants of God, in every age and in every part of the world. Nor can any eminence, in all those holy dispositions before described, (which combine to form the Christian character, are "the fruits of the Spirit," and constitute the image of Christ,) preserve any man from his hatred of the world; nay, they will expose him to it, so long as men in general remain the servants of Satan: for even Christ himself, the only perfect character which ever appeared on earth, was exposed to the greatest contempt and enmity of the world. V. 13. Salt is the grand preservative from corruption in the material world, and it gives a seasoning to all our viands: but, if it loses its saltness, and becomes insipid, it is the most worthless of all substances; being unfit even for the dunghill, as it is rather conducive to sterility than fruitfulness. The disciples and ministers of Christ are scattered about, as salt, in different parts of the world; that their doctrine, conversation, examples, labours, and prayers may stop the progress of sin and impiety, and be instrumental in seasoning men's minds with grace and holiness: but if they be unsound in doctrine, unholy in life, or vain and carnal in conversation; they disgrace their profession, are a scandal to their Master, prejudice the minds of men against the truth, or seduce them into error; and so they become the most worthless and wretched of mankind. Every approach to this renders a Christian or a minister unfit to be "the salt of the earth," and deducts from his value and usefulness. This was peculiarly applicable to the primitive professors and teachers of Christianity: as they were sent forth to season the whole world, as it were, with their holy doctrine, lives and labours.

Lost his savour.] 'The word μωρανθη has a peculiar beauty and strength here, and might literally be rendered, "if it be infatuated," or grown foolish; alluding to the common metaphor, in which sense and spirit are expressed by salt; ... as we call a flat lifeless discourse insipid.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 14—16. The same instruction is here conveyed under another image. Christ is the true "Light of the world:" but his disciples and ministers, shining by the light of knowledge and holiness derived from him, are, in a subordinate sense, "the light of the world" also; and diffuse his truth and salvation around them, where otherwise darkness and wickedness must reign undisturbed. Their profession, character, and doctrine render them conspicuous; as "a city set upon a hill, they cannot be hid:" men will look at them, and make observations on all their words and actions, in order to form a judgment of their religion from what they see. Indeed, God intends that they should be thus conspicuous and observed, that they may communicate their light around: as we do not light a candle to conceal it, but that it may be placed conveniently to lighten the room. It is, therefore, their bounden duty, and should be their grand object, so to recommend the truth which they openly profess, by their pious and edifying conversation and behaviour, that men "may see their good works" which flow from faith and love, and thus be induced to glorify their God and Father. (Notes, 1 Pet. 2:11,12.) For the holy examples and abundant good works of true Christians soften men's prejudices, win on them to attend to the truth, and are instrumental to their conversion, by which they glorify God, and become his worshippers and servants.—This should be the aim and effect of their general conduct; though they must not do any particular action "to be seen of men," or seek their own glory in any thing. (Note, 6:1—4.)—Those disciples who were intended for the apostolical office, might primarily be meant, but every minister and Christian is concerned. (Marg. Ref. Note, Phil. 2:14—18.)

V. 17, 18. Various opinions seem to have prevailed, about the changes which would take place under the Messiah: and many, who supposed Jesus to be the Messiah, and had heard some parts of his doctrine, were ready to conclude that he meant wholly to set aside the ancient religion, and to establish an entirely new one in its place; which idea tended to mislead some and prejudice others. But he assured them that he had not "come to destroy the law or the prophets," or to teach any thing inconsistent with the true meaning of their sacred writings, which would still continue in force as a part of divine revelation. His design was not to "destroy, but to fulfil." It was evident from Moses and the prophets themselves, that the ritual law was "a shadow of good things to come:" and Christ was come to fulfil the intent of it, and to hold forth the truths and blessings typified by it, in a plainer and more intelligible manner. The moral law he came to fulfil, by perfectly obeying it as the Surety of his people, in his life, sufferings, death, and doctrine; to establish it in its fullest honour and authority; and to make the most effectual provision for men's loving and obeying it. (Note, Rom. 3:29—31, v. 31.) So that, as long as the world endured, not the least word, or letter, or point, or comma, (so to speak,) of the whole law, should by any means lose its authority, or fail of answering the end for which it was given: and the moral law would, to the end of time, continue the standard of sin and holiness to all men, and the believer's rule of duty; for Jesus came to accomplish the design of the introductory dispensation, and not to counteract or subvert it.—'Christ came not to bring any new way of righteousness and salvation into the world: but to fulfil that in deed, which was shadowed by the figures of the law, by delivering men through grace from the curse of the law; and moreover to teach the true use of obedience which the law appointed, and to grave in our hearts the force of obedience.' Beza.—'The phrase' ("till all be fulfilled,") 'occurs, importing the performance of what was typified by the law, and foretold by the prophets, 24:34. Mark 13:30. Luke 21:32.' Whitby. The fulfilment therefore of legal types, and of the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, must be intended, as well as the establishment of the moral law in full honour and authority. In another passage, (Luke 22:16. Gr.) a still more emphatical word is employed, in a similar connexion; which fully confirms the above interpretation.

V. 19. The Scribes and Pharisees made many frivolous distinctions between great and small commandments; as the papists do between mortal and venial sins; yet all the law is enacted by the same divine authority, and no part of it can, in that sense, be of small obligation; though some parts may respect more important matters than others. But if a man, professing to be the disciple of Jesus, by a misconstruction of his doctrine, should encourage himself in allowed disobedience to the holy law of God, though in a matter of the least importance; and, by false doctrine, or assumed authority, should teach others the same: whatever his station in the church, or reputation among men, might be, he should be called by Christ himself, "the least in his kingdom;" either no true disciple at all, or one of the most inconsistent and mean of the whole company. On the other hand, he whose practice and doctrine tend to induce men to keep the commandments of God, from proper principles, and for evangelical purposes, will be accounted "great in the kingdom of heaven," however men may disesteem him; and the King will approve, employ and prefer him. This most conclusively shows, that all views of evangelical truth, which verge in the smallest degree to antinomianism, are utterly inconsistent with the true doctrine of Christ. These are, indeed, as antichristian, as popish dispensations and indulgences; they lead to the same place by another road: they relax man's obligation to obey God; and so dishonour that law, which Christ came into the world, and died on the cross, to magnify and make honourable.

V. 20. The Scribes were the most learned teachers of the law, and of the traditions of the elders, among the Jews; and most of them were Pharisees. Their learning related chiefly to those external matters, in which the pharisaical righteousness consisted; and the Scribes and Pharisees made the highest profession of religion, and were accounted peculiarly strict, both in their instructions and practice. But our Lord, in setting up his kingdom, declared that he would not acknowledge any one as his subject, whose righteousness did not exceed their righteousness. And, in fact, a new creation to holiness, and the effect of that change on a man's temper and conduct, constitute a righteousness of heart and life far more excellent than that of the Scribes and Pharisees; even as much as heaven is higher than the earth. Without repentance and faith we cannot enter Christ's kingdom; these produce hatred of sin, and love of God and man; thus the believer is "taught by the grace of God, to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts; and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this world:" and without this he cannot enter the kingdom of heavenly glory. Nay, how late in life soever a man is converted, and becomes a true believer, he actually possesses a far better personal righteousness, before he enters heaven, than that of any formalist in the world. The Scribes and Pharisees 'seem to have taught, that the precepts of the law extended only to the outward actions; that a zeal in the ceremonial parts of religion would excuse moral defects and irregularities; and that some important privileges were inseparably connected with a descent from Abraham. ... It has been commonly said by the Jews, that if but two men were to enter into the kingdom of heaven, one of them would be a Pharisee, and the other a Scribe.' Doddridge. It may be added, that the zeal and strictness of the Scribes and Pharisees, both in doctrine and practice, was chiefly shown about their own traditions, by which they "made void the law of God;" and about minute observances, by which they covered over their neglect of judgment, mercy, and faith, or the love of God and man. And in this they have been imitated by vast multitudes in all succeeding ages.

V. 21, 22. To illustrate his meaning, the divine Teacher proceeded to vindicate several of the commandments of the moral law, from the corrupt and partial interpretation put upon them by the Scribes; which tended to show, that their rule of righteousness itself was beneath even the actual attainments of his disciples. "It had been said by," or to, "them of old time, Thou shalt not kill." (Marg. Note, Ex. 20:13.) God had of old given the law; and the tradition of the elders had made this gloss upon it, "Whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment." By this it was implied, that nothing except actual murder was prohibited; and that this was to be avoided mainly from the dread of the capital punishment to be inflicted by the magistrate. Thus they explained away the extensive spiritual import of the command; and led the people to overlook the awful curse of God denounced against transgressors. But Christ, the great Lawgiver and Judge, speaking with less terror, but not less authority, than when he delivered the commandments from mount Sinai, declared that "whosoever was angry with his brother without cause, would be in danger of the judgment." All excessive anger must be proportionably "without cause;" and all that settles into revenge, or vents itself in words and actions, contrary to the law of loving our neighbour as ourselves. We ought to be angry at sin in ourselves and others, and to show our disapprobation of it, according to our relation to the offender; (Note, Mark 3:1—5. v. 5.) we should seek his humiliation and reformation by proper means; but not his hurt, in any respect, at least not in our private capacity. Inferiors, servants, juniors, are all brethren in this sense; and he that is angry at another without cause, or above cause, "shall be in danger of the judgment:" it is a sin deserving of a punishment more terrible than that inflicted by the ordinary courts of justice on the murderer; and consequently it calls for deep repentance, and needs the mercy and forgiveness of the new covenant. Moreover, whosoever uses contemptuous or opprobrious language in the heat of his passion, calling his brother 'an empty worthless fellow,' or 'a wicked and abandoned profligate,' and such like, would be in danger of punishment, proportionably more severe, according to the degree of virulence or malignity contained in such revilings. The different courts of justice, and the different kinds of punishment in use among the Jews, are supposed to be referred to, in these expressions. By one court, it is said, the criminal was condemned to be beheaded; by another stoned; and by another burned in "the valley of the son of Hinnom," which was considered as a sort of type or emblem of the fire of hell. Of this punishment the conduct above described was deserving, and to this the criminal would be exposed, according to the degree of his crime, unless repentance and forgiveness intervened. This shows both the need which all have of the gospel, and the strictness of the believer's rule of duty. (Marg. Ref.) 'These words, vain and foolish, when they are used by men assisted by the Spirit of God, or speaking by virtue of their office, out of a spirit of charity, and an ardent desire to make men sensible of their folly, do not make men obnoxious to this guilt; ... (Gal. 3:1. Jam. 2:20.) ... but only then when they proceed from causeless anger, ... and ill will towards them.' Whitby.—Minerva, in Homer, forbids Achilles striking 'Agamemnon; yet gives him leave to reproach him, and counsels to contumelious words.' Hammond.—This is heathen or classical morality.

V. 23, 24. Attention to expensive externals was often used by Jews of old, as well as by papists and others, in later ages, as a compensation or dispensation for injustice; and this the selfish priests encouraged, as it tended to their profit. But if any one of Christ's disciples should bring an oblation to the altar of God; and, even after he arrived there, should recollect that his brother had any just cause of complaint against him, he must not presume to offer his sacrifice, till he had gone, without delay, and made restitution for the injury done, or acknowledgment of the offence committed; and by all proper means and reasonable concessions, sought forgiveness and reconciliation. Nor must he, on this account, omit or long postpone his intended sacrifice; but leave it before the altar, and return as soon as this previous matter was settled, and then offer it in confidence of acceptance with God This is spoken of in the language of the dispensation then in force: but it is equally applicable to Christian ordinances, especially to the Lord's supper. Restitution to the injured, (where practicable,) and concessions to those whom we have offended, as well as forgiveness of injuries, are requisite preparatives to the profitable and comfortable attendance on that sacred ordinance; but to neglect attendance for want of this preparation, is excusing disobedience to God, by injustice and malice towards man. The rule is, "First be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift."

27 ¶ Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, [z]Thou shalt not commit adultery:

28 But [a]I say unto you, [b]That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, [c]hath committed adultery with her already in his heart.

29 And [d]if thy right eye [e]offend thee, [e]pluck it out, and cast it from thee: [f]for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell.

30 And if thy right hand [g]offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be [h]cast into hell.

31 It hath been said, [i]Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement:

32 But [k]I say unto you, That [l]whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery.

33 ¶ Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, [m]Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the LORD thine oaths:

34 But I say unto you, [n]Swear not at all; neither by [o]heaven, for it is God's throne;

35 Nor by [p]the earth, for it is his footstool; neither by Jerusalem, for it is [q]the city of the great King:

36 Neither [r]shalt thou swear by thy head, [s]because thou canst not make one hair white or black.

37 But [t]let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these [u]cometh of evil.

the matter with his legal opponent, though the terms might appear rigorous, and to settle the business ere it came before the magistrate; lest, being found culpable, he should be cast into prison for costs and damages, and continue there till the last farthing were paid.—But under this prudential counsel, a far more important instruction is couched. Our injurious conduct towards men, (as well as our other sins,) renders us liable to the wrath of God, who is our Adversary at law. We are on the way to his judgment-seat; our time may be short; a way of reconciliation is revealed; and we should avail ourselves of it immediately. If this be neglected, the cause will come to a trial, the sinner will be condemned by the Judge, delivered to the executioners of vengeance, and cast into the prison of hell: and, seeing that he can never make satisfaction to offended justice, or pay all his debt, (especially as new crimes will continually enhance the score,) so he must not expect to be enlarged any more for ever.—'Here it is insinuated, how much more it concerns us in time to repent of our offences against God, and to endeavour to be reconciled unto him, lest we be cast into the infernal prison.' Whitby. (Note, Luke 12:58,59.)—Agree. (25) Ισθι ευνοων· 'Be disposed to be friendly. 'Be desirous of agreement.' Ευ and νους the mind.—Adversary.] Αντιδικω, properly, an opponent in a trial at law. Luke 18:3. 1 Pet. 5:8. (Εκ αντι et δικη, judicium.)

V. 27, 28. The Pharisees interpreted the seventh commandment, merely as a prohibition of actual adultery with a married woman: but Christ showed, that its spiritual import reached to the thoughts and desires of the heart. For instance, if a man should allow himself to gaze at a woman, in order that thoughts of a criminal intercourse might be excited, or till they were; he would be deemed an adulterer in his heart, and deserve the punishment denounced against adulterers: and his guilt would be still more aggravated, if he indulged the licentious imagination, and actually purposed or devised means for gratifying his desires: though he should by any means be prevented. We cannot suppose, that this prohibits a man from looking at a woman whom he may lawfully marry, with such a predilection as to desire to possess her in marriage. The inclination for that which is not sinful, can only become sinful by being inordinate: but it may be, and alas! commonly is, attended with such things as are greatly polluting and criminal. (Note, Ex. 20:14.)—'The expositors of the law said, If a man sees a woman, whom he loves better than his wife; let him divorce his wife and marry her.' Jerom. This is a specimen of Rabbinical morality! (Marg. Ref.)—To lust after. (28) Επιθυμησαι. The word marks a strong desire, but it is used in a good, as well as a bad sense. (Luke 22:15. Rom. 7:7. 13:9.)

V. 29, 30. This exact subjection of the sensual inclinations, this victory over the most potent desires of the heart, (especially when habit and constitution have concurred to enslave men,) must be attended with painful exertions, and the sacrifice of what has been highly valued. But though it be as painful, and as sensible a loss, as "plucking out a right eye, or cutting off a right hand" would be, it must be done. "The flesh with the affections and lusts must be crucified," the strongest corruption conquered; and every appetite and inclination governed, in subjection to the authority of God, and in subserviency to his glory, the welfare of society, and the good of a man's own soul. If then the eye, or hand, or any other part of the body, could be so necessary an occasion of sin, that the temptation could by no other means be overcome, and that would certainly effect it; it would be a man's duty and wisdom to part with it, whatever anguish he endured, or how much soever the loss might be felt: as it would be advantageous for him to lose one of his limbs, or organs of sense, rather than be cast with them all into hell. But, though the members of the body are the instruments of sin, yet it proceeds from the lusts of the heart: if these be mortified, and every idolized object renounced, there will be no need to injure the body; and without this it would be of no use.—This mortification of sinful passions may be excessively painful; but if men consent to lose their limbs, by excruciating operations to save their lives; what ought they to shrink from, when it becomes requisite to the salvation of their souls? It must be also added, that the most watchful and self-denying government of every sense and appetite, is implied in this admonition.—It is worthy of observation, that Jesus always took it for granted, that there is a future state, a resurrection of the body, and a hell into which the wicked will be cast; and that he continually realized these things to men's minds, and called their attention to them. (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—'The greatest part of Christ's auditors, were poor people who lived by their daily labour; and to these the loss of a right hand would be a much greater calamity than that of a right eye; so that there is a gradation and force in this passage, beyond what has generally been observed.' Doddridge. (Notes, Mark 9:41—50.)

Offend.] Σκανδαλιζει, derived from σκανδαλον, a stumbling-block, or a bridge in a trap.—The word literally signifies cause to stumble, in this and many other places in the New Testament. A stone is placed in the way, over which a man falls, and is lamed or killed; or a trap, in which he is taken: thus, whatever occasions sin is a stumbling-stone, or a trap.—Is profitable.] Συμφερει, rendered expedient; 1 Cor. 10:23.

V. 31, 32. It has been shown, (Note, Deut. 24:1—4.) how the Jews mistook and perverted the judicial law, which permitted and regulated divorces, and was intended to render them less frequent and injurious: so that, when Christ appeared, they were exceedingly common upon the most frivolous pretences. Having therefore mentioned the seventh commandment, our Lord took the occasion to determine this matter by his authority: and he declared that whosoever should "put away his wife," except for fornication committed before marriage, but concealed till afterwards, or for adultery after marriage, (for the general word is supposed to imply both,) would expose her to a strong temptation to commit adultery by marrying another man, and he would be accessary to her sin; and the man, who should marry her who was put away, would commit adultery, her former husband being still living.—It seems evident, that divorces for adultery, on either side, should be allowed to the injured party, if required, and without any tedious or expensive process. Some contend that the adulterous divorced person should not be allowed to marry again: this perhaps would be consistent with justice; yet it can scarcely be expected, that they who violate conjugal fidelity, will be very scrupulous in a single state; and therefore more harm than good would result from the regulation, which is not found in Scripture. It may likewise be observed, that the allowance for divorcing the adulteress seems to imply, that the law for putting to death criminals of this class, was not to be considered as indispensable, under the New Testament. (Notes, 19:3—12.)

V. 33—37. The Scribes explained the third commandment, according to the tradition of the elders, as merely prohibiting gross perjury, especially the breach of promissory oaths, or vows to the Lord: and they allowed common swearing, except the names of God were expressly mentioned (Note, Ex. 20:7.) But Christ commanded his disciples not to swear at all. Many examples in the New Testament pro that swearing on solemn and important occasions is not unlawful: (2 Cor. 1:23. 1 Thes. 2:5.) and there seems no reason to conclude, that oaths in a court of justice, or on any other occasion which fairly requires them, are wrong: provided they be taken with reverence of the majesty, omniscience, and justice of God, and be exactly consistent with truth and equity. Yet the multiplication of oaths in our judicial, commercial, and ecclesiastical transactions, and the irreverent manner in which they are administered, occasion immense guilt; and are an enormous evil, even exceeding all calculation. (P. O. Jer. 23:9—32.) A pious man, however, though he disapproves of the manner in which oaths are administered, needs not disquiet himself when called on to take them, if he can otherwise do it with a clear conscience, for he is only answerable for his own conduct. But all oaths taken without necessity, on trivial occasions, or in common conversation, must be inconsistent with this prohibition; as well as all the expressions, which are in common use, to answer the purpose, and, as it were, to evade the guilt, of an oath. The Jews, who scrupled to swear on such occasions by JEHOVAH, would swear by heaven, or by the earth, or by Jerusalem, or by their own heads. But all these oaths implied an appeal to God, because of their relation to him: "heaven is his throne," where he reveals his glory as the Ruler of the world; and the earth is, so to speak, "the footstool" of that throne; Jerusalem was "the holy city," where the temple, the earthly palace of the great King, was erected: even the heads of the persons concerned were more the Lord's than their own; for, while the continuance of life, understanding, and senses depended on him, they themselves could not change the colour of one single hair by their own exertion.—The whole creation is the Lord's, and therefore to swear by any part of it, implies an appeal to the great Creator and Judge. Thus, when men swear by their lives, their souls, their faith, or by all that's good, they virtually swear by the Lord, and appeal to him to confirm their testimony. Such expressions ought not to be used; much less should conversation be intermingled with the sacred names of God, Lord, or Christ, as mere expletives, or notes of admiration; or with bad wishes; or even good wishes or prayers, as 'God bless us,' 'Lord have mercy on us,' and such like; when there is no seriousness or solemnity upon the mind, and when they are words without meaning, but not without profaneness.—It is remarkable that even the writings of the most admired Pagan authors are interlarded with oaths, by Jupiter, by Hercules, or others of their idols; and some professed Christians affect to use this Pagan language: but if an oath is a solemn act of worship, and if the devil was worshipped under these Pagan idols: such expressions imply an act of worship to Satan, though they who use them may mean no such thing. It ought to suffice a Christian, seriously and constantly to affirm or deny, and with decided repetition if necessary: all that is more than this, in ordinary cases and conversation, cometh of evil, of the evil one, or of the evil of our corrupt nature. Men are so deceitful, that they fear trusting each other without the security of oaths: they have suspicions of each other; or the speaker is of a suspicious character, and fears lest his bare word should not be taken; or he swears to conceal his bad designs. But Christians should endeavour so to speak and act, that their word may be deemed as satisfactory as another man's oath. Indeed, though the whole necessity for oaths arises from the selfishness and deceitfulness of man; yet the worse men become, the less they are restrained by them; and the better they are, the less need there is for them.—'This clause contains a demonstration, that the thirty-fourth verse is to be explained with the limitation proposed; for it is evident that oaths were in some cases not only allowed, but required, by the Mosaic law. (Ex. 22:11. Lev. 5:1. Num. 5:19,21. Deut. 29:12,14.) So that, if Christ's prohibition had here referred to swearing in solemn and judicial cases, he would in these words have charged the divine law with establishing an immorality.' Doddridge.—The term rendered "communication," is (λογος) word, or discourse, and limits the prohibition to conversation and social intercourse: so that to extend it to judicial and public transactions, is not warranted by the passage itself. (Note, Jam. 5:12.)

V. 38—42. (Ex. 21:24,25. Lev. 24:19,20.) The law referred to was a judicial regulation, and the magistrate's rule in deciding causes; declaring the utmost punishment which he might inflict, when nothing less would satisfy the offended party: yet the Scribes explained it, as if it had authorized private revenge, and had even required people to demand or exact this severe retaliation. But Christ declared, that the moral law required the reverse of this vindictive spirit and conduct. His disciples are not allowed to "resist evil," or the injurious party, either by violent opposition, or litigious lawsuits.—In the present state of human nature, there is little need to enumerate exceptions and limitations to such general rules: self-love will suffice, and more than suffice. The preservation of life, or liberty, or important property, authorize, and in many cases require, a man to stand in his own defence, at the peril of the illegal assailant: but in ordinary cases, it is better to give way, and yield to insults and injuries, than to repel them by force, or legal process; and it does not accord with the spirit of Christianity, to put the life and soul of man in competition with a sum of money, however great, when there is no reason to fear further violence. In smaller matters, however, the case is quite clear. If a man give a disciple of Christ a contemptuous or painful blow on the cheek, it is his duty and wisdom to imitate his Master, and take it patiently, nay, rather to turn the other, and expose himself to further insult, than to begin a contest, by returning the blow, sending a challenge, or commencing a lawsuit; even though he should be ridiculed and despised for his want of spirit and courage, through his obedience to his Lord. If a man be sued at law, and injuriously deprived of his coat, or outer garment, which, though of small value, he could ill spare; he had better suffer himself to be defrauded of his cloak also, than be involved in the temptations and evils of seeking legal redress. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:1—8.) Indeed, in cases of great importance, other duties may require a man to avail himself of the protection of the law: justice to his creditors, and to the public, and even to his family, may engage him to defend his estate, and to give a check to the exorbitancy of unreasonable men; and a Christian may prosecute a criminal, out of love to public justice, though not from private revenge. Yet, there are generally men of the world enough to deal with such depredators; and a disciple of Christ seldom has occasion to waste his time, or endanger the loss of his temper, about them.—Under various pretences also, unreasonable men may require Christ's disciples to attend them about business, public or private; but if they should insist upon a man's going a mile out of his way to serve them, it would be better to go two than quarrel about it: and it would be expedient rather to give or lend, to those who injuriously required it, than to refuse with harshness or apparent selfishness: and much more to give, or to lend, where there is need, and a prospect of doing good.—It is self-evident, that many and great limitations and exceptions must be admitted in the last instance: for no man could go on giving and lending to every one who should ask him; but he must consider his own ability and the nature of the case, and act accordingly: and therefore, we must suppose that limitations and exceptions are implied in the other admonitions, which must be judged of, according to the general law of "loving our neighbour as ourselves." The grand and obvious instruction is this, 'Suffer any injury for the sake of peace, when no duty requires the contrary; and commit your interests and concerns to the Lord's keeping.'—The case of those, who were compelled by authority to accompany and convey the baggage of travellers sustaining a public character, is supposed to be meant in the forty-first verse. Even if the case were oppressive, or the person compelled were legally exempted, compliance would be preferable to a contest.

V. 43—48. The Scribes explained the great law of loving our neighbours, with restriction to their own nation, sect, family, or friends; nay, they added, (in the form of a precept,) "and hate thine enemy:" and it is remarkable that the best heathen moralists made large concessions, in this matter, to the malignity of the human heart. But the true spirit and intent of the law reaches to enemies and persecutors, on which the example of Christ himself forms the best comment. (Notes, Luke 10:25—37.) He therefore authoritatively commanded his disciples to "love their enemies," to regard them with compassion and benevolence; to return good words and kind wishes to their revilings and imprecations, and beneficent actions to their injuries; and to pray for their conversion and best good, even when oppressed, persecuted, and tortured by them. Thus they would evidence themselves to be the chil dren of God, by bearing his image and copying his example; for he sends the ordinary blessings of providence upon the evil, as well as on the good, though their crimes are direct enmity and rebellion against him. As, however, there are various favours which he bestows only on his people; so our peculiar friendship, kindness, and complacency may and ought to be restricted to the righteous: yea, gratitude to benefactors, and predilection for special friends, consist very well with this general good-will and good conduct towards enemies and persecutors.—Even publicans, and the most ungodly men, knew how to behave, with civil respect and kindness, to their friends and relations: but Christians, considering their superior knowledge, obligations, encouragements, assistances, and motives, must do "more than others:" else what has grace done for them? What evidence have they of conversion? What recompense can they expect from their Lord, for that of which wicked men are capable? They cannot indeed attain to perfection, but it is their duty to aim at it: the perfect law is their rule and standard; the perfect holiness and love of God, their pattern; they should aim high, and seek to be "perfect, even as their Father which is in heaven is perfect." These concluding verses evidently prove, that our Lord's spiritual exposition of the law was intended, both to show the people their need of mercy and salvation, and also to teach his disciples the strict rule of duty: and all that, in which they come short of it, or deviate from it, is sin, and needs deep repentance, continual forgiveness through his blood, and grace to enable them for more exact obedience.—The publicans 'had the oversight of tributes and customs: a kind of men, that the Jews hated to death; both because they served the Romans in those offices, (whose yokeful bondage they could hardly away withal;) and also because these toll-masters were for the most part given to covetousness.' Beza.—'These words, "Thou shalt hate thine enemy," are not found in the law of Moses; though nothing is more common in the Jewish canons; ... which affords a strong argument, that Christ here is not correcting, or adding to the moral precepts of the law; but opposing the corrupt interpretations of the Scribes and Pharisees. ... A neighbour is every one with whom we have any dealing: ... so the word must signify in the tenth commandment, if we do not leave the Israelite free to covet the wife of the Gentile.' Whitby.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The great end of preaching is, that men may hear and be made wise unto salvation. When multitudes willingly attend, it is seasonable for the minister to preach, and time and place are not very material circumstances: a church or chapel is most convenient, and the Lord's day the most favourable time; but a mountain or a field will be a holy place, or any day holy, if the Lord vouchsafe his presence and blessing. The preaching of the gospel was shown to be a most honourable employment, by our Lord's own condescending example: and happy are they who enter upon it at his call, act in it from the same principles, and preach the same doctrines, as he did. But it behooves us to speak with great seriousness, and a deep sense of the weight and difficulty of the work; and in a simple dependence on the Lord, for assistance, acceptance, and a blessing.—The true gospel is exceedingly practical, far more so than any other doctrine whatever; and numbers so mistake in this matter, that they would certainly condemn Christ himself as legal, if they could hear his sermons without knowing who the preacher was. True religion is so inseparably connected with happiness, that none can be happy without it, in this world or in the next: or fail of happiness, if they duly attend to it. But how different are the character and circumstances of the blessed, as stated by our Lord, from what the carnal mind would have imagined! None, who have not faith and experience, will be persuaded, that "the poor in spirit," the mourners, the meek, those who long earnestly for righteousness, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peace-makers, and the persecuted, are the only happy persons in the world. Let us learn to consider this as a compendious description of a healthy constitution of mind, and a safe and happy condition in life; and to consider the opposite dispositions and passions as distempers, spoiling all true enjoyment, and by no means counterbalanced by the friendship of the world. Let us not suppose, that some men possess one, some another, of these holy dispositions; but remember, that they all combine to form the image of Christ, and the temper of a true Christian; and that where any one is absolutely wanting, all the rest are mere counterfeits. Let us also examine, whether we ourselves do actually possess these Christian graces: let us seek them and the increase of them, from the Giver of every good gift: let us take the annexed promises as encouragements to aspire after higher attainments; assured of proportionate happiness, as the subjects and heirs of the kingdom of heaven, and as the children of God, till we shall be admitted into "his presence, where is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore." Let us never envy the ambitious, the high-spirited, the gay, the injurious or vindictive, the avaricious, the sensual, or the unmerciful; the scourges of the earth who take away peace from it, or any other of the sons of madness and mischief: let us not covet their transient applause and prosperity in this evil world: let us not be disquieted with the contempt, reviling, and persecution, which we meet with, whilst we do all the good that we can to all, and no evil to any. Happy will it be for us to suffer for Christ's sake, and in that cause for which he shed his precious blood; for "great will be our reward in heaven." But let us be careful to give no just cause to the revilings of the ungodly, and to avoid all ostentation or bitterness under the cross: let us consider what prophets and apostles endured, and how they behaved under their trials; and especially let us "look unto Jesus, lest we be weary and faint in our minds," and yield to impatience and recriminations under our lighter trials. (Notes, Heb. 12:1—3.)

V. 13—16. We ought most carefully and frequently to consider the vast importance of the Christian character; recollecting that we are "the salt of the earth, and the light of the world:" many eyes will be upon us; many will derive good or harm from their observations on our conduct. We should then endeavour to stem the torrent of impiety and wickedness, to diffuse the savour and light of divine truth, and "to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour;" "letting our light shine before men," that our good works, as living sermons, may convince our fellow-sinners of the excellency of religion, and so conduce to the glory of God and the benefit of mankind. On this account also the Christian must by no means conceal his sentiments: for God does not enlighten the minds of his people, that they should put the light under a bushel, but that they should hold it forth for the benefit of others. Nor are they required, or even allowed, to retire into cloisters or deserts, or any secret recesses, or to bury themselves in obscurity; but to fill up their stations in families, in society, and in the church, so as to glorify God in the sight of men. We should therefore seek to shine, by professing and adorning the gospel, in our circle, whether large or small, that we may answer the end for which God has "called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." (Note, 1 Pet. 2:9,10.)

V. 17—20. Let no man perversely suppose that Christ allows his people to trifle with any command of God. While he fulfilled the types and prophecies of the Old Testament; while he honoured the moral law and the exhortations of the prophets, by his obedience to death upon the cross; how impious must it be to suppose, that he purchased for men the license of indulging their lusts with impunity! No; till the consummation of all things, "not one word shall pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." No sinner partakes of Christ's justifying righteousness, till he condemns himself as a transgressor of the law, and repents of his evil deeds; and the goodness and mercy, revealed in the gospel, lead the believer to still deeper repentance and self-abhorrence. All unbelievers will be condemned for their transgressions of this law; but it is the Christian's rule of duty, nay, it is written in his heart, and he delights in it, and longs to obey it. Let us then equally beware of antinomian licentiousness, and of pharisaical self-righteousness: these are Scylla and Charybdis, the fatal rock and whirlpool; and we need "the Lord the Spirit" to pilot us between them. But the clear and full exposition of the holy law of God, and the scriptural application of it to the heart and conscience, form the best preservative from these fatal extremes. They indeed, who inculcate more soothing doctrines, will best please those who say, "Speak smooth things;" but they are certainly the least of those that belong to the kingdom, if indeed they at all belong to it: while those who enforce obedience, by example and doctrine, "shall be called great in the kingdom of God;" nor will any man enter heaven, who has not in this world become more holy in heart and life, than Scribes and Pharisees ever were.

V. 21—32. We ought most attentively and reverently to consider, how important the Lord Jesus judged the right understanding of the moral law; and how fatal consequences followed from superficial or erroneous views of it. While we therefore view the strictness, spirituality, and reasonableness of its precepts, as expounded by our divine Teacher; let us impartially compare our past and present lives, our tempers, affections, thoughts, words, and actions, with this perfect rule: then we shall find every self-confident hope expire, and plainly perceive, that "by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified in the sight of God:" and then Christ and his salvation will become precious to our souls. Whether we look to our conduct towards those who have injured us, or towards those whom we have offended; towards our superiors or inferiors, relatives, friends, or servants; the state of our heart, or the government of our passions; to what we have done, or what we have not; we shall see great cause for humiliation, and need of forgiveness: and when we consider that we must be made holy according to this standard, in order to the enjoyment of God and heaven; we shall as evidently perceive our need of the powerful influences of the Holy Spirit, and learn to value the ordinances of God, through which his sacred assistance is obtained.—Thus it will also appear most evident, that strict justice to men, as well as humiliation before God, is indispensably necessary, to our acceptably approaching the throne of grace, or the Lord's table: and we shall frequently be led to examine, whether any of our brethren have just cause of complaint against us, that we may remove every impediment to our comfortable communion with our heavenly Father.—When we further weigh, with serious attention, the importance of eternity, and the shortness and uncertainty of our lives, we shall perceive the propriety and necessity of making our peace with God without delay, and shall learn to value and imitate our blessed Peace-maker, who will shortly appear as the Judge and Avenger of all the impenitent workers of iniquity. Mature reflection on our situation in this world, will reconcile us to that self-denying and painful mortification of our evil propensities, and strict government even of all the bodily appetites, to which we are indispensably called: we shall see tender mercy couched under the apparent harshness of the requirement; that our safety, advantage, and felicity are consulted; and that the grace and consolations of the Spirit will render it practicable and even comfortable. And, would we be preserved from gross iniquities, our hearts must be kept with all diligence, and our eyes, and all our senses and faculties, forbidden to rove after those things which lead to transgressions: and the strictest rules of purity and self-denial will be found, by experience, the most conducive to true and solid comfort, even while in this present world.

V. 33—42. How excellent are all the commandments of God! Yet how spiritual and extensive! Who can deny, that such a union of reverence towards the glorious God, and inviolable veracity and integrity towards men, as our Lord's prohibition of swearing, and his rule for our intercourse with each other, imply, is most reasonable and valuable? Indeed all the commands, which require the exact government of the tongue, with meekness, patient endurance of injuries, love of enemies, yielding to the injurious, and doing good to our persecutors, though contrary to corrupt nature and the maxims of an evil world, have an evident excellency in them; and are calculated to form a character of real dignity, and bearing a great resemblance to the divine purity, patience, beneficence, and mercy: and doubtless they, who act according to these rules, will both have most peace and comfort themselves, and be the greatest blessings to their families, neighbours, and the community. Were these precepts universally obeyed, the greatest part of the evils in the world would be annihilated: wars, murders, lawsuits, domestic discords, frauds, oppressions, would cease: unavoidable evils would be mitigated, and rendered more supportable: equity, truth, purity, peace, and love would, as it were, descend from heaven to dwell on earth, and drive their hateful opposites down to hell, from whence they came. Thus it would be if all men were Christians, and well understood and practised their holy religion. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.)

V. 43—48. Our motives, encouragements, and manifold advantages, suffice for considerable attainments in all things More may be expected from those, who are "redeemed to God by the blood of Christ," than from other men; more will be found in them, notwithstanding inward and outward impediments; and whenever they suffer themselves to be outdone, or even equalled, in what is outwardly good and commendable, by such as are strangers or enemies to the gospel, they forget their principles and degrade their character. Let us all then beg of God to enable us to prove ourselves his children, by copying his example of goodness and mercy, even to the vile and injurious; not "being overcome of evil, but overcoming evil with good;" let us learn to reverence an oath, as well as to pay the Lord our vows: let us aim to establish such a reputation for truth and integrity, that we may be readily believed, when "our communication is yea, yea, nay, nay;" that we may not be tempted to any of that language which cometh of evil. In short, let us be "followers of God, as dear children, and walk in love, even as Christ loved us, and gave himself a sacrifice" for our sins; and, in following after higher degrees of holiness, let us expect, as our gracious and glorious reward, to be at length made "perfect, even as our Father who is in heaven is perfect."

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. The religion of the Pharisees was distinguished from that of Christ, by its motives, as much as by its rule. Our Lord therefore next proceeded to warn his disciples against hypocrisy and ostentation, in external duties. He began by admonishing them, not to perform "their righteousness," (marg.) or good works, "to be seen of men." Thus some ancient copies and approved versions read it as a general word, including the several particulars which follow. Christians should "let their light so shine before men, that others may see their good works, and glorify their Father;" yet they ought not to do their works, in order "to be seen of men." Their general conduct should be so exemplary, as to constrain others to see an excellency in their religion: but every action should spring from humility, the fear and love of God, and regard to his acceptance and glory; and not from a desire of being noticed and commended. (Notes, 5:14—16. 23:5—7.) This our Lord illustrated, by mentioning some of those religious services, in which hypocrites are most tempted to ostentation and vain glory; and in which Christians should most consult secrecy, as far as it is consistent with other duties. He therefore instructed his disciples, that when they gave alms, or contributed to charitable or pious purposes, they should shun notoriety as much as possible. The hypocrites of that time bestowed as much pains to publish their liberality, in the synagogues, public assemblies, and even streets, as if they had caused it to be made known by sound of trumpet; for they sought, as their primary object, the applause of men, and to be accounted excellent persons. Not but that they made a merit before God of their services, and expected them to compensate for their sins, and purchase heaven: but, had not the praise of men been principally aimed at, they would not have been so earnest in proclaiming their liberality; and therefore this praise would prove their sole reward. But the disciple of Jesus must "not let his left hand know what his right hand doeth:" he should act as secretly as the case will admit, and not think of it himself, or indulge self-complacency: he must not desire that his charity should be known, or spoken of; but rather that it should be concealed, that he may be satisfied of having acted out of regard to the will and favour of his heavenly "Father who seeth in secret," and not from desire of worldly applause; and in this case, his Father, seeing both the action and motive to be good, will graciously accept, and publicly recompense them, especially at the day of judgment. Circumstances vary, and require variations, in our outward conduct there are many charities which can scarcely be promoted without some degree of public notoriety; and frequently a leading person may be called to excite those who are backward, by a useful example. Yet no duty is more liable to be made an occasion for vain glory than this: and many designs, very beneficial to others, are supported by a liberality which almost entirely springs from this corrupt principle. The heart is deceitful; and when men love to have their names inserted among the subscribers to public charities, but are not equally liberal in private; when they love to speak and hear of their own beneficence, and are not willing to do so much without the credit of it; it is too plain how the case stands with them. In general, private charities, if not more useful, are more unequivocal; and the less reward we receive from man the more we may expect from our gracious God; provided we act from evangelical principles. Our Lord here takes it for granted that his disciples will give alms, more or less, according to their ability; and that every good work done from proper motives will be rewarded by our God and Father (Notes, 10: 40—42. Heb. 6:9,10.)

5 ¶ And when thou prayest, [o]thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: [p]for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. [q]Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

6 But thou, when thou prayest, [r]enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

7 But when ye pray, [t]use not vain [u]repetitions, as [x]the heathen do: for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking.

8 Be not ye therefore like unto them; for [y]your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him. [Practical Observations.]

From ὑπο and κρινω to judge.) Stage-players.—'Men who carry themselves with other faces than their own, as these do on the stage.' Leigh. The word is derived from the profession of actors on a stage, who personate characters which do not belong to them, and which, when the public exhibition is over, they cease to assume among those who know them in private life. This they do in order to obtain profit and honour; and hypocrites in religion assume in public a false character for similar purposes.

V. 5. The hypocrites in our Lord's days were very ostentatious in their devotions. Not contented with frequenting the synagogues to join in public worship, they resorted thither to offer those prayers which ought to have been made in secret; and they stood and prayed in the view and hearing of all the people; nay, it seems that they stopped in the corners of the streets, or where two ways met, to perform their devotions; professing, perhaps, that it was the stated time, and they must not, on any account, omit or postpone the duty. They, however, contrived this, on purpose "to be seen of men," that all might know how devout they were, and applaud and confide in them accordingly. This reputation indeed many of them acquired, and reaped the benefit of it; (Note, 23:14.) but they must expect no other reward.

Verily.] Αμην, from אמן, of which Kal is not used; but which, in Niphal, signifies to be firm, certain, true, worthy of credit. Among other derivatives from this root is אמן, as it occurs in many places of the Old Testament, and is generally retained in our translations. (Num. 5:22. Deut. 27:15, &c. Jer. 28:6.)—In one place, (Is. 65:16.) it is rendered as a substantive: "He that blesseth himself in the earth, shall bless himself in the God of truth; and he that sweareth in the earth, shall swear by the God of truth (באלהי אמן)." or the true God: τον Θεον τον αληθινον. Sept. The apostle uses the word remarkably when he says, "All the promises of God in him are yea, and in him amen." 2 Cor. 1:20. (εν αυτῳ το ναι, και εν αυτῳ το αμην. See Rev. 1:7. Gr.)—Our Lord assumes it as his own title or name, Rev. 3:14. "These things saith the Amen, the true and faithful Witness." (Ταδε λεγει ὁ Αμην, κ. τ. λ. not το Αμην, as in the words of the apostle.)—'But it very often passes into a particle, which, being placed at the beginning of a sentence, is the language of one asserting, confirming, and thus even swearing: and it means, truly, certainly, verily, undoubtedly. The doubled Αμην, which has the place of a superlative and more strengthens the asseveration most truly, most certainly, occurs very frequently in the gospel of John.' Schleusner. Αμην 'is the same with αληθως, as appears by comparing Luke 9:27. with Matt. 16:28. and Mark 9:1.' Leigh. Christ alone used the word "Verily," in this manner. (5:18,26. 8:10, &c.) It is an exceedingly strong affirmation, especially when doubled, and is never thus employed, except to confirm matters of great importance, which men are backward to believe; John 1:52. 3:3,5,11. 5:19,24,25. 6:26,32,47,53, &c. and perhaps not very different from the expression in the Old Testament, "As I live, saith the LORD."

V. 6. The Christian, when he prays alone, (for private is to be distinguished from public and social worship,) must be as retired as possible; he should go into his closet, or chamber, or any secret place, and shut the door, that he may not be overheard or disturbed; and there pour out his heart before God, as into the bosom of his loving Father; only desiring to be noticed and accepted by him, who seeth the secret recesses of the heart, as well as the most retired corner of the house. Such prayer God will accept, answer, and reward; yea, it shall be openly declared before men and angels as an evidence of a man's humility, faith, and unfeigned piety; and graciously recompensed accordingly.—Here, likewise, circumstances may demand a different conduct; Daniel saw it right to be very open in his devotions, as not afraid or ashamed, in most perilous times, of being known to pray to his God; and in some cases this exposes a man to contempt and the cross, which it may be his duty to bear for the Lord's sake. They who are constant in private devotions, cannot entirely conceal it from their families; and generally they should not studiously desire to do it.—A field, a garden, or a mountain, may be as retired as a closet; they are consecrated by Christ's own conduct; and wherever the heart can be lifted up to God, without men's observing it, the Christian may properly offer his prayers; though in the most public concourse of cities, camps or courts. (Note, Neh. 2:4.)

V. 7, 8. It is evident, that this rule is not transgressed by using repetitions from the fulness of the heart; when, earnestly craving some special mercy, men know not how to give over, or to proceed to another subject. (Note, 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) These are not "vain repetitions," but like those which Christ himself made in the garden; and both he and his most eminent servants have undoubtedly used many repetitions. (Marg. Ref. u.) But such repetitions are meant, as Baal's priests used during several hours, for which Elijah even derided them. (Notes, 1 Kings 18:26—29.) These were common among the Pagans, as learned men have clearly shown: and the church of Rome has imitated them in their numerous Pater-nosters and Ave-Marias, which the people are taught to use, without either meaning or devotion; and which they number, in performing their penance or task, by counting strings of beads.—But many others are in a measure faulty in the same way in private and social worship; both of those who use forms, and of those who pray extempore. It is not uncommon for men to employ the most words, when they have the least meaning; and to spend the time in vain repetitions, even when the affections, and perhaps the very thoughts, are otherwise employed. This is an imitation of the heathen, who thought to excite their deities to help them, by the multiplicity of their words. But Christians should have more honourable thoughts of their omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, and merciful Father, who knoweth what they need and desire, before they begin to ask him, and is disposed of himself to give them all they want. He requires his children to pray, that they may more sensibly feel and acknowledge their indigence and dependence; that their desires and expectations may be excited; and that they may thus be brought into a proper frame of mind, to receive the blessing, and render him the praise. All copiousness in prayer must no more be condemned than all repetitions; for Christ continued whole nights in prayer; and there are so many things to be asked, for ourselves, and for others, near and far off, that if our hearts be in a spiritual frame, we may pray for a long time together, without formality or unmeaning repetition. But where these begin, devotion ends. 'Cicero denies God's omniscience, declaring that he did not think that God himself could know things casual and fortuitous. The heathen thought it not fit to allow of a God so curious as to attend to all things, or take care of all things, or to think all things belonged to him; and they thought it as well impossible, as unsufferable, in the God of the Christians, that he should diligently inspect the manners, actions, words, and secret thoughts of all men, and be every where present with them.' Whitby.—This observation illustrates the propriety and energy of the instructions given in these verses. If philosophical heathens entertained such mean thoughts of the supreme Being, what must have been the delusion and superstition of the ignorant multitude, when they exclaimed, vociferously and incessantly, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" or, "O Baal, hear us!"

Use not vain repetitions. (7) Μη βαττολογησητε. Used here only. Some derive the word from a poet called Battus, who was noted for unmeaning verbosity: words without ideas. In a popish Psalter, addressed to Jesus, the word JESU, is repeated fifteen times together, with only have mercy upon us help us, intervening; and ending thus, 'Give me here my purgatory.'—Heathen.] Εθνικοι. 18:17.—From εθνος, a nation.

V. 9. We now enter on the consideration of that prayer, which Christ repeatedly taught his disciples; and which perhaps contains more important instruction, than can any where else be found in so few words.—Some expositors argue, that it was only intended for the use of the disciples, before the introduction of the Christian dispensation. But neither Mat thew, nor Luke, who recorded it after that dispensation was more fully opened, give any such intimation. We are not indeed directed in this prayer, to present all our petitions in the name of Christ, and through his merits and intercession; for it was not proper explicitly to declare this at that time.—No doubt the form has been greatly misused, by unmeaning repetitions, to the exclusion of real prayer; and it is often repeated, even by Protestants, with very little understanding, and not without some degree of superstition. But, perceiving these mistakes, some pious persons have run into the opposite extreme, and have improperly objected to the use of it, and even in a measure have overlooked the abundant instruction contained in it.—On this occasion our Lord introduced the prayer by saying, "After this manner pray ye:" in St. Luke's gospel we read, "When ye pray, say." It may often be proper to use the very words, but it is not always necessary; for we do not find that the apostles thus used it: but we ought always to pray, after the manner of it; that is, with that reverence, humility, seriousness, confidence in God, zeal for his glory, love to mankind, submission, and moderation in temporal, and earnestness about spiritual things, which it inculcates; avoiding vain repetitions, and using grave and comprehensive expressions. Nor can we offer one petition, warranted by the word of God, which is not virtually comprised in these few instances.—Christ instructed his disciples especially, though in the hearing of the multitude; and he had before frequently spoken to them of God, as "their Father in heaven," whom they were called upon to glorify, from whom they were to expect their reward, and who knew what things they had need of. Under this endearing character he here teaches us to address him in prayer. He is the Father of all living creatures, being the Author and Preserver of their existence; of all rational creatures, as "the Father of spirits;" and especially of men, whom he continues to provide for, and do good to, notwithstanding their transgressions. But, though he has always been as a Father to us, we have rebelled against him; and by joining the arch-apostate, and becoming like him, we are in state and character "the children of the wicked one." Yet, under a dispensation of mercy, through the divine Mediator, our God is still revealed as a reconciled Father, who is ready to receive his rebellious offspring, whenever they are willing to return to his worship and service. As soon as the sinner "comes to himself," and purposes to return to God by faith and prayer, he is taught to approach him as a kind Father, and not as an inexorable Judge and Avenger; that he may come before him with encouragement. So that this endearing appellation teaches the mourning penitent to pray with hope, and the established believer with filial confidence; as well as to regard the glory of his Father, and to seek for all the dispositions of dutiful children.—The expression "which art in heaven," reminds us of the sovereign and universal authority, power, and majesty of God; and of his justice, holiness, greatness, and felicity: for heaven is the high, holy, and happy place, the throne of God, and the region of pure delight. This then instructs us to come before God with deep humility, and adoring reverence of his majesty and condescension; with abstraction of mind from external objects and carnal imaginations; with spiritual desires and large expectations, and aspiring to the purity and felicity of his heavenly worshippers.—The first petition is, "Hallowed be thy name," or, 'Let thy name be sanctified, and had in honour.' The name of God signifies his being and perfections, even all that is implied in the appellations by which he is known among men. (Note, Ex. 34:5—7.) We are taught to pray in the first place, that this name of God may be known, loved, adored, and glorified. We desire in this petition, for ourselves, that happiness which is to be enjoyed in the service and favour of God; that we may so behold his glory, as to love, adore, and honour him; and that he may be glorified in and by us for ever. We also pray, that the Lord would, in the same manner, make himself known to others around us, till all nations know and "worship him in spirit and truth," as the God of salvation, and as revealed to us in his word.—So that this is a prayer, that all atheism, infidelity, idolatry, impiety, superstition, ignorance, and false religion, may be banished from the earth; that God would make himself known, in his mysterious nature, and incomprehensible glory and grace, to all nations; that He, and He alone, as one God in three persons, may be worshipped and honoured, spiritually and acceptably, all over the whole earth, and by every one of the human species. (Marg. Ref. c. Note, 28:19,20.)—Hallowed.] [c]Αγιασθητω. John 17:17,19. 1 Cor. 7:14. Heb. 10:29.—Gen. 2:3. Ex. 20:8. Lev. 10:3. Sept. (From ἁγιος, holy, or a saint.)

V. 10. The next petition has given rise to the opinion, that this prayer was only suited to the first opening of the Christian dispensation, which is frequently called "the kingdom of God," and "the kingdom of heaven." (Note, 3:2.) But, so long as any part of the earth remains under the power of sin and Satan, this petition must be proper; nay till the whole kingdom of grace shall be swallowed up in the kingdom of glory. In order that "the name of God may be hallowed," the kingdom of the Messiah must come, and be established on earth in its energy and efficacy. This petition therefore implies, first, an earnest desire, that this kingdom of God may be set up in our own hearts, reducing all within us to entire subjection to Christ our King: then, that it may be set up in the hearts of our children, relatives, servants, friends, neighbours; that 'all, who call themselves Christians, may be led into the way of truth' and holiness; that the true gospel may be every where preached, "with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven" to render it efficacious; and that "all kings may fall down before" the Redeemer; that "all nations may do him service:" and in short, that sin, and Satan, and all his party may be banished out of the world, and shut up in hell, never more to defile or disturb the creation or kingdom of God. Every thing relating to the sending forth, qualifying, and success of ministers, to the conversion of sinners, to the peace and purity of the church, to the subversion of antichristian powers, and the bringing of Jews, Pagans, and Mohammedans into the church, is implied in this petition.—'We therefore in this petition ... pray, that all men may become subjects to the kingdom of God erected by Christ; that the knowledge of the Christian faith may come to all nations; that "the kingdoms of this world may be the kingdoms of our Lord Christ;"... "all kings and nations, people and languages doing him service;" ... that his kingdom may be advanced, by the "coming in of the Jews," and by the "fulness of the Gentiles;" that the Christian religion may obtain every where, as well in reality as profession; the minds of all men being subdued "to the obedience of faith," and they showing forth the virtues of it in their lives.' Whitby.—To this is annexed, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." The will of God may be considered, either with respect to his commandments, or his providence; strictly speaking, his providential will is done in earth equally as in heaven; but that submission, acquiescence, and satisfaction in it, which angels feel and express, may be intended. Yet the use commonly made of this clause, as if it exclusively meant resignation to the will of God, greatly limits and enervates its weighty and extensive import.—The inhabitants of heaven do the will of God, universally, perfectly, harmoniously, without weariness, and with ineffable delight: and we are taught to pray, that all the inhabitants of the earth may imitate and emulate their example; that the whole race of men, becoming the disciples and subjects of Christ, may renounce all sin and wickedness, and obey God's commandments, with constancy, harmony, and alacrity, as angels in heaven do; that an end may be put to all injustice, oppression, fraud, violence, bloodshed, intemperance, licentiousness, ungodliness, selfishness, malice, and contention; and that righteousness, truth, goodness, mercy, purity, love of God and of each other, may fill the earth, even as they fill heaven. And what a change would this be! What an extensive petition is this!—At the same time we are taught to pray, that all men may rejoice in the sovereignty and glory of God; and be contented and satisfied with his appointments respecting them, without envy or ambition; but rejoicing to see others honoured, prospered, and happy; even as the inhabitants of heaven do. And, whilst we request so many and great blessings for others, we are taught to ask this obedient, submissive frame of mind for ourselves, and to seek for it and aim at it, in our whole conduct. (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.)

V. 11. Having "in the first place sought" those things which pertain to "the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and prayed for the display of his glory, and the best good of men, all over the earth; we are next directed to ask of God thos things, which pertain to our bodies and this present life.—Many indeed explain this petition, as if spiritual blessings, even "the Bread of life, which came down from heaven to give life unto the world," was meant; and some even interpret it of the sacramental bread in the Lord's supper. But the supply of our temporal wants seems immediately intended. "Bread" is one principal part of the things which are needful for the body, and it is often put for the whole; by the use of this word, therefore, we are taught to ask only things that are necessary, without craving superfluities; and to refer it to our Heavenly Father, to determine what things are necessary, according to our station in life, our families, and various other circumstances. All Christians, whether rich or poor, ver us from evil: For [n]thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever, [o]Amen.

are instructed to ask this provision from God: for all depend upon him for it, should receive it as his gift, give him thanks for it, and use it to his glory; whether it come from their estates, commerce, husbandry, professions, labour, or skill; or from the liberality of other men. We are taught to ask it for the day; (perhaps with reference to the manna, which Israel received fresh every day;) and this instructs us to beware of covetousness, to be moderate, and contented with a slender provision, and to trust God from day to day. We ask it as "our bread," which may intimate, that we must expect it in the way of honesty and industry: for all that is gotten by fraud, or any kind of sin, is "the wages of unrighteousness," and the maintenance given, so to speak, by Satan to his servants. Whilst we seek our daily bread from God, we must diligently use all lawful means of obtaining it, and be provident, industrious, and frugal: but we must reject, with abhorrence, all that might be gotten by means inconsistent with piety, equity, truth, and charity; and never expect to be supported in sloth or extravagance. (Note, Prov. 30:7—9.)—'Lord, give us, day by day, that which shall be sufficient for the remainder of our lives.' Whitby. This accords with the clause, as found in the gospel by St. Luke, "Give us day by day our daily bread."

V. 12. Whilst we seek from day to day, from our heavenly Father, so many and great blessings, we must not forget, that we have forfeited our claim to them by sin, and are deserving of his heavy indignation. But "there is forgiveness with him:" and therefore we are taught to pray for forgiveness, as often as for daily bread; not only of our former sins, but of our renewed offences in thought, word, and deed, in heart and life, of omission and commission, in our conduct towards God and man. By these we contract debts continually. We receive our being and all our powers and possessions from God, to whom they all ought to be devoted in perfect love; by our failure in this we contract a debt, which we cannot pay, but which needs continual remission. (Note, Luke 7:40—43.)—Being taught to ask forgiveness every time we pray, we are thus reminded to exercise constant watchfulness, self-examination, humiliation, faith and hope in the mercy of God through Christ, and patience, and forgiveness of others: for we are required to add, "as we forgive our debtors." We ought to forgive others, as we expect forgiveness from God: their failures of duty to us constitute a small debt contracted by them, like our great one in failing of our duty to God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 18:23—35.) True repentance and genuine faith always produce a disposition to forgive others: habitual malice and revenge are proofs of impenitence: if a believer be betrayed into an unchristian spirit in this respect, he must not expect the comfort of forgiveness, or communion with God; but frowns, rebukes, and corrections, till reduced to a better temper. We are, therefore, thus reminded frequently to examine ourselves in this particular, with special impartiality, lest, in praying for the pardon of our sins, we should in fact call for wrath instead of mercy to our souls: at the same time we are reminded to pray for the humble, gentle, forgiving spirit, thus emphatically required of us.—The use of the word debts, is not to be understood of pecuniary debts, which the debtor is able to pay, and the creditor cannot well afford to lose: yet where our debtors are in the same circumstances respecting us, as we are in respect of God; that is, when they have it not in their power to pay us, and would be ruined, or greatly distressed, if we rigorously insisted on it; then we must remit the debt, as we hope for God to remit ours.—'This petition supposeth, ... that we ... are sinners, and want God's mercy in the pardon of our offences against him: ... that these our sins, should God deal with us according to the merit of them, must render us obnoxious to his just displeasure; ... for seeing every sin is a transgression of God's holy law, it must render us guilty, till by an act of grace we have obtained the remission of it: and, ... being the first spiritual petition we make for ourselves, it shows how much we are concerned to obtain it; our happiness depending wholly on the favour of God, and our misery on his displeasure.' Whitby.—'It is hardly possible to imagine a more effectual expedient to promote the forgiveness of injuries, than this of making it a part of our daily prayers, to ask such pardon from God, as we impart to our offending brother.' Doddridge.

V. 13. The disciples of Christ are next instructed to pray, that the Lord would "not lead them into temptation." (Note, Gen. 22:1.)—God never puts evil into our hearts, or stirs it up there by any positive influence: in the former respect, "a man is tempted by his own lust; and enticed," in the latter, by Satan or wicked men. (Note, Jam. 1:13—15.) But Providence may lead us into such circumstances, as have a tendency to give our inward corruptions, and the temptations of Satan and his agents, peculiar advantage against us. This the Lord sometimes does, to prove the reality or power of our grace, the sincerity or hypocrisy of our profession, or the remaining prevalency of sin. But, conscious of our own weakness and depravity, fearing to offend God, dishonour the gospel, grieve our brethren, stumble others, or wound our own consciences, we ought to pray, continually and most earnestly, "not to be led into temptation;" beseeching God to mortify our sinful propensities, to restrain the malice and power of the tempter, to keep us out of difficult and trying circumstances, to proportion our strength to our day, and never to permit us to be "tempted above what we are able." Thus we are instructed to hate and dread sin, whilst we hope for mercy; to distrust ourselves; to rely on the providence as well as grace of God, to keep us from it; to shun temptation as much as we can; to watch over our own hearts; to be habitually prepared to repel the assaults of the tempter, and to take care not to become tempters to others. Alas! immense harm often comes to us, by overlooking this needful request. (Note, 26:40,41.)—The concluding petition is, "But deliver us from evil." Some expositors render it "from the evil one;" which, indeed, is a literal translation: but why should we confine the interpretation? We are taught to pray for deliverance from all kinds, degrees, and occasions of evil from the malice, power, and subtlety of the powers of darkness; from this evil world, and all its allurements, snares, tempters, and deceivers; from the evil of our own hearts, that it may be subdued, and finally extirpated; from the evil of suffering; from the final wrath of God; from terrible or injurious temporal calamities; from the terror and sting of death; from the power of death, by a glorious resurrection; from all evil, natural and moral; from sin and all its consequences, by the complete restoration of both body and soul to holiness and happiness, glory and immortality, in the enjoyment of the divine favour, and in the beatific vision for evermore. It is a prayer, that whatever temptation, persecution, or affliction may overtake us, we may be preserved through all: and finally obtain eternal life and felicity, by the mercy and grace of God in Jesus Christ.—To this is added a concluding doxology, "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever, Amen." That kingdom, for the coming of which we pray, is the LORD's; all power and authority are his; and he is able to set it up in our hearts, and in the world, in defiance of all opposition: and his will be the GLORY to all eternity; so that this may be considered as a reason why our prayers should be answered, and an encouragement that they will. Or it may be understood, as an expression of our cordial joy and satisfaction, that the kingdom, power, and glory are the Lord's for ever; as becomes the children of our Father in heaven: and our desire and purpose to give him all honour, worship, love, praise, thanksgiving, and obedience for evermore; and our ardent wish that all others might do the same.—To all this we are taught to set our confirming and entire assent, by the word "Amen," So be it: 'Let all this be so established and completed to the glory of God, and we desire no more.' (Marg. Ref. o.)—What now is there in this prayer, which is not purely evangelical, and suited to the case and wants of every Christian, and every congregation? What can be more spiritual, comprehensive, or energetic? What is wanting? or what redundant? What more fraught with glowing zeal for the honour of God, expansive love to mankind, and fervent thirstings after all the blessings of salvation? What can be more replete with important instruction? It only wants to be better understood, and used with correspondent affections, to constitute such devotion as would almost emulate the worship of heaven.—'This clause' (the concluding doxology) 'is not in St. Luke, nor in many copies of St. Matthew: yet there are sufficient reasons for receiving it as a part of the Lord's prayer; as being in the Syriac version, and owned in the Greek liturgies, and being in most ancient copies; ... and ... because it is very unlikely that the holy fathers of the Greek church should presume to add their own inventions to a form of our Lord's own composing. But it is probable, that our Lord, delivering this form twice, upon different occasions, might add this clause at the first time, and leave it out at the second; and that the Latin copies, which are full of errors, might leave it out in both, lest the evangelists should seem to differ in a matter so considerable.' Whitby.—It is so perfectly scriptural, and so replete with instruction, that the internal evidence of its authenticity is unanswerable. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:10—19. Ps. 21:13. Rev. 11:15—18.)

V. 14, 15. Our Lord, by this declaration, calls our attention most powerfully to the clause in the twelfth verse, "as we forgive our debtors;" and, by substituting "trespasses" for "debts," still further illustrates his meaning. We cannot suppose, that forgiveness of those who injure us, can in any degree merit the forgiveness of God; or that he will pardon the impenitent and unbelieving, because out of a natural facility of temper they forgive others, without any due regard to his authority and glory. The persons addressed are professed disciples: when "their hearts do not" in this respect "condemn them, they have confidence towards God," though conscious of much unworthiness; but if their hearts condemn them, their confidence will be abated: (Note, 1 John 3:18—24.) and if they utterly fail in this, their hypocrisy is manifested. (Notes, 18:21—35)—'To this true remission it is requisite, that our minds be wholly freed from all desires of revenge, or of returning evil [for evil]: ... that we do not rejoice in any evil that befalls our brother; (Prov. 24:17.) ... that we do not so retain the evil done to us, in our memory, as ... to upbraid him with it; ... that we be still inclined to show kindness to him, and be still ready to help and do him good. ... So far we must go on in our forgiveness of all persons, at all times, even though they do not ask forgiveness. When this is done sincerely, then we are to admit our offending brother into friendship and familiarity again: ... our heart must be toward him as formerly it was. ... This remission must be without delay, ... seeing we pray ... for forgiveness at present; and if we do not thus forgive, we cannot say "Forgive as we forgive." It must be ... entire, ... even of the most heinous crimes; ... otherwise ... we pray that our greatest crimes may not be forgiven. It must be extended to our brother, though he doth frequently offend; (Luke 17:3.) for we pray daily to God for the remission of our daily sins.' Whitby.—The term brother is frequently used on this subject: but it is evident, that we are not only required thus to forgive our brethren in Christ; but also our bitterest persecutors, for Christ's sake.

V. 16—18. Our blessed Lord, having given these copious instructions concerning prayer, proceeds to caution his disciples against ostentation in another religious duty. The Pharisees fasted often, but in a hypocritical and self-righteous manner: even in their private fasts, they used to appear abroad with gloomy countenances, and with such sordid and slovenly neglect of their persons, as gave every body to understand how they were employed. They assumed this appearance to keep up their credit, and to gain applause for their extraordinary sanctity: and this would be their sole reward; for God would not accept these vainglorious services. But Christ's disciple (who is supposed on some occasions to fast, as well as to give alms and pray) should avoid all ostentation, when thus humbling himself before God; and in his family, or when called from home, be as cheerful, and as decent in his attire, as at other times: that he may not appear to men to fast, but be satisfied with the notice and acceptance of God his Father, who is present in the secret chambers of his worshippers, as well as in their public assemblies; and who will graciously and openly reward such unfeigned expressions of humiliation for sin, mortification of the flesh, desires after holiness, and abstraction from worldly pleasures, for the sake of communion with him. 'The word rendered "a sad countenance," is properly, the look of a wild beast; a lion, or a bear robbed of her whelps, grim and ghastly.' Leigh. That rendered "disfigured," seems to imply, the neglect of usual attentions to the hair, &c. and the covering of the face, as mourners used to do. (2 Sam. 19:4,24.) Thus the face, or usual form of it, disappeared.

V. 19—21. The Pharisees aimed to be seen of men, not only to obtain applause and reputation, but to gratify their covetousness: and therefore our Lord next warned his disciples against this destructive evil. As a Christian is a pilgrim on earth, and a citizen of heaven, he in this world wants merely subsistence, or, so to speak, travelling expenses; but he needs "a treasure in heaven." He ought not therefore to "lay up for himself a treasure on earth:" for this must shortly be left to others; and all things here below, however idolized or valued, are liable to decay and waste. Moths eat and spoil the garments of those who have rich wardrobes; nay, even metals are corroded by rust; and thieves break into the houses of the rich, to seize their treasures, and often to attempt their lives. (Note, Jam. 5:1—6, vv. 2,3.) However wealth be secured, it is uncertain; and far more constantly a source of vexation and disappointment, than of solid comfort. (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) Such things are not the Christian's treasure: the acquisition of them should not be his object; he should be contented without them; and if they be intrusted to him, he should neither store them up for himself, nor spend them on himself, but lay them out in doing good. (Notes, Luke 12:15 —21. 16:1—13,19—26.) Heavenly things are his treasure: these he should prize and seek, in diligent faith and prayer, and in the improvement of his talents. They are not liable to decay or uncertainty, nor can he be robbed or deprived of them. This is likewise, in all respects, of the greatest importance: for if a man's treasure be laid up on earth, his heart will be earthly; and all his thoughts, affections, projects, conduct, and conversation will be earthly. But, if heavenly things be chosen as a man's most valuable treasure, his heart will be heavenly, he will continually be thinking about spiritual matters; his very soul will be, as it were, in heaven. This will give a heavenly savour to all his discourse, and the whole tenor of his actions; (Note, Phil. 3:20,21.) preserve him from, or strengthen him against, those temptations which ruin worldly men; and quicken him in every part of duty.—Before fashions changed, as they have done for some time past in this part of the world, wardrobes formed a considerable part of the riches laid up by worldly men, and left to their heirs: and this is the case, in the eastern regions, to this day.

V. 22,23. The preceding truths are here illustrated by an apt similitude. The actions of the whole body are directed, according to the light received by the eye: when that organ is single, or clear, and perceives objects as they really are, the whole body has light, and the man moves with safety and propriety: but if the eye be evil, and sees things confusedly, and without distinction, he stumbles as in the dark, and is continually liable to lose his way, or run into danger. Thus an enlightened understanding, perceiving objects according to their real nature and value, enables a man to form a proper judgment, to make a wise choice, and to conduct himself aright respecting them. But a darkened mind, leading to a mistaken estiamte of things, produces an erroneous choice, and the more earnestly the deluded person proceeds, the further he wanders from the way. If, then, that which is supposed by any one to be his chief wisdom, be indeed folly—if his first principle be an error—"the light that is in him is darkness," and how intense and fatal must that darkness be! —This immediately relates to men's practical judgment of earthly and heavenly things. The worldly man mistakes in his first principle, and therefore all his reasonings and calculations must be erroneous; and the further he goes, the more fatally he is bewildered. But it is equally applicable to false religion. When that which a man deems extraordinary illumination, whether from philosophy or enthusiasm, is a mere delusion, his very light is thickdarkness from the bottomless pit: all his inferences and proceedings lead him further from God, from truth, and from holiness; and plunge him still deeper into error, prejudice, spiritual pride, and the snare of the 24 ¶ No man can [g]serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and [h]Mammon.

[Practical Observations.]

25 Therefore [i]I say unto you, [k]Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. [l]Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?

26 Behold [m]the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet [n]your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?

27 Which of you [o]by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?

28 And [p]why take ye thought for raiment? Consider [q]the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin:

29 And yet I say unto you, That [r]even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

30 Wherefore, If God so [s]clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, [t]O ye of little faith?

31 Therefore take no thought, saying, [u]What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed?

32 (For [x]after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) [y]for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things.

33 But [z]seek ye first [a]the kingdom of God, and [b]his righteousness; [c]and all these things shall be added unto you.

34 Take therefore [d]no thought for the morrow; [e]for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. [f]Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

prince of darkness. This is an awful, yet a common case: how very carefully then should we examine our leading principles by the word of God, and with earnest prayer for the teaching of his Holy Spirit! (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. 8:20. Luke 11:33—36.)

V. 24. A man may do some service to two masters, but he cannot devote himself to the service of more than one; now God requires the whole man, and will not share the heart with the world. When the two masters, and their interests, are in full opposition to each other, the impossibility of serving both of them is evident. This is the case in respect of God and the world: they are two opposites; he who loves and holds to the world, as his master, will be an enemy and despiser of God; and he who loves and cleaves to the service of God, will renounce the friendship and despise the frown of the world. So that we cannot "serve God and Mammon." (Note, Luke 16:9—13.) Mammon is the Syriac word for riches, and seems here used as the name of an idol: the covetous man is an idolater, and therefore he is no true servant or worshipper of God, who is jealous, and will endure no rivals. By a proper arrangement of our worldly concerns, in subordination and subserviency to religion, we may render them a part of God's service; as worldly men make their religion a part of the service of Mammon: but the two opposite services cannot be attended to.—'We love Mammon more than God, when we pursue it by unlawful ... means; by a lie, as Ziba and Gehazi; by ... oppression, theft, violence, or by false testimony: for in all these cases, we despise God's authority to obtain Mammon. ... When our labour or concernment in these temporals doth cause us to ... be remiss in our duty to God; ... and when we cannot part with them for his sake, but choose rather to ... quit our interest in spiritual than in temporal blessings; ... then we certainly cleave to them more than God; and him we do comparatively despise.' Whitby. (*Marg. V. 25. The anxious fear of want, and the solicitude about a future provision, often as much ensnare the poor, as the love of wealth does the rich. Therefore Christ expressly enjoined his disciples to "take no thought for their lives, &c." There is a care about temporal things, which is a duty, according to a man's station in the world. He should mind diligently, and with prudent contrivance, his proper business; he should provide for himself and family, as far as honest industry will go; he should calculate his income, and form his plan to live within the bounds of it, that he may not needlessly be embarrassed with debts; he should see that no bounty of Providence be wasted or lavished; he should make such arrangements as he is able, for those demands which will be hereafter made on him; he should spare needless expense, that he may not want, or be constrained to beg, in sickness, or old age; and he even may, and in some cases ought, to make a moderate provision for his family, if he can do it consistently with justice, piety, and charity: yet there is much danger lest these cares be extended beyond due bounds. No one ought, however, to be solicitous about events, or anxious how he shall be provided for in future. This is the Lord's part; and when any take it on themselves, they distrust and dishonour him, become their own tormentors, and are often tempted to sinful methods of making provision for themselves, or their families. This is the care, or solicitude, which is prohibited. The Christian, trusting in God and attending to his duty, must not be anxious about the continuance or support of his life; he must neither be greatly concerned about the measure of his supplies, nor the manner in which they are to be obtained. The Author of his life, and the Former of his body, having done greater things for him, should be depended on for the less; and food and raiment should be sought and expected from him, in the use of lawful means exclusively.

V. 26—32. This great Householder (so to speak) of the universe, "openeth his hand, and filleth all his creatures with his bounty: the birds of the air, which are so gay and cheerful, are provided for by his care without any of their own; for they are not able to use any means for their sustenance. And surely the believer is far more valuable in the sight of his heavenly Father, both as a rational creature, and as a spiritual worshipper, than the birds of the air! Indeed such cares are altogether vain. No man could add a cubit to the height of his stature, if he were ever so solicitous about it, and therefore no man thinks of it: and in fact, no anxious care can add to the length of men's lives, or to their health, comfort, or prosperity. It is equally absurd to be anxious about raiment; even the lilies of the field, which are incapable of adorning themselves, are far more beautifully decorated than Solomon, or any earthly monarch, in his royal robes. And has the Lord, with such profusion, adorned the very vegetables, that will so soon be cut down, withered, dried up, or burned; and will he not suitably clothe the Christian? Or should he be desirous of such adornings, as are surpassed by the flowers of the field. This must arise from weakness of faith, respecting the truths and promises of God, which will expose a man to just rebukes. Solicitous and distrustful inquiries about temporal things may consist with the character of those who know not God; who consequently must count the world their portion, and who rely on their own foresight for obtaining the good things of it: but Christians have a nobler portion, and a better Provider. "Their Father knoweth what they want;" and he has sufficient power, truth, goodness, and love to them, to send what is best for them: their anxiety is then entirely superfluous. The clause, "a cubit to his stature," is by many learned men understood to mean 'an addition to the length of a man's life.' The original word for "stature" certainly often means age; but it is used in Greek authors for stature, or the size of plants, &c. and probably no instance can be given from any author, of a cubit being used as a measure of time.—Fuel is very scarce in the eastern parts of the world, and the stalks of lilies, and other large flowers, when withered, would be very useful in heating ovens, and for similar purposes.—A few passages have been quoted from the writings of heathen philosophers, to show that some of them used the same arguments against carefulness, which our Lord here employs: but they are brought from those writers, who lived after Christianity was established; and it is highly probable, that they were derived from the New Testament, by those who thence took materials to improve that philosophy with which they opposed the gospel: and in this they have had many followers.

seek admission into this kingdom by repentance and faith, and every means of grace; and to press forward to the full participation of its privileges, and conformity to the law, and example of their righteous King; and also to seek the purity, peace, prosperity, and enlargement of the kingdom, the honour of their Prince, and the good of their fellow subjects. These must be sought, "in the first place," as the first object, with the first of their affections and time; beginning the year, the month, the week, and the day, with this business, and ordering all things in subserviency to it. Then their bountiful Father will add all those things which pertain to this present life, without their anxious carefulness: but they who reverse this order, take the way to ruin themselves, in respect of this world, and that which is to come. The Christian should not be careful even about the very next day; for it may never arrive to him; and if it do, it will bring its supports and supplies with it: and thus, as it were, "take thought for itself." This should be considered as a merciful appointment of his heavenly Father. He knows that every day brings more trouble and suffering than men can well bear; he therefore allows, and commands his children to "cast all their care" about the future on him. And if any will, notwithstanding, be so absurd as to load themselves with a heavy burden which does not belong to them, and then groan under self-imposed sorrows, they torment themselves, as well as dishonour God, by their folly and unbelief.—This is also applicable to spiritual things. The Christian, while watching, praying, and attending to his duty, is authorized to trust the Lord to give him grace sufficient for future trials and temptations, as well as food sufficient for future temporal wants: and in both cases "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. How various are the ways in which the evil of our hearts leads us aside from "simplicity and godly sincerity." Hypocrites corrupt their duties by selfish motives; on which account profligates and infidels excuse their neglect of religion: but Christians must attend on every good work, and every means of grace, from right principles, and with a holy intention; and the less they seek reward and honour from men, the more confidently may they expect them from God. What discoveries will be made at the last day! Many an admired character will then be detected as a vainglorious hypocrite, in his charities, devotions, and austerities. But, at that solemn season, the secret charities and fervent prayers of true believers, who earnestly seek the good even of their bitterest enemies; and all their secret self-denial, and mortification of their sinful propensities, arising from love to God, and holiness, will be openly proclaimed and rewarded. Whilst the most specious part of an ungodly man's character is held forth to view, and his crimes and corrupt motives are studiously concealed; and whilst the infirmities of a pious man are noticed, and his good works, and holy affections and purposes, are veiled with the mantle of humility; the real difference may be but feebly discerned: but when the whole shall be made known, all the world will see the one to be meet for heaven, and the other justly deserving of his awful doom. Let us then remember, in every thing, to act as before "our Father, who seeth in secret;" and as desiring no reward, but that which he will graciously bestow on his beloved children, for all "their work and labour of love." (Note, 1 Cor. 4:3—5, v. 5.)

V. 9—18. It is peculiarly important that we should accurately examine in what frame of mind our prayers and supplications are offered; and learn daily from Christ how to pray with acceptance, and confidence of success. If we truly desire the glory and favour of God, and deliverance from guilt, temptations, and sin, above all other things, we may be sure that he will answer our prayers. If he have taught us to forgive our brethren for his sake, we may be assured of his ready forgiveness of our sins, though many and aggravated: if we desire to have him for our Father, in Christ Jesus, and to possess the spirit, and act in the character, of his children; we may come near to him, and call upon him, and confide in him, as our Father: and those who refuse to do this at present, must shortly be constrained to appear before Him as their awful Judge. But let all beware of malice and revenge; for whatever a man may profess, if he do not forgive others, even his most implacable enemies, God has not forgiven him; and will not forgive him, if he continue of this rancorous disposition.—A morose and gloomy countenance is no part of religion, nor any ornament to the profession of it; and it often covers a proud, hypocritical heart: but real humility, sorrow for sin, and deadness to the world, should be accompanied by a decent and unaffected cheerfulness in the sight of men, springing from gratitude to God, reliance on him, and the hope and earnests of his heavenly glory.

V. 19—24. We should peculiarly watch and pray against covetousness: "treasures on earth" can little profit dying creatures: yet we are in danger of losing them before we die: and they are only certain, as sources of anxiety, snares, and vexations. But there is an inheritance which is "incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for" true believers: for this let us labour with all diligence, that we may secure it, and increase our portion in it, whatever be neglected or renounced for the sake of it. Anxiety about the world cannot consist with a heavenly mind: for "where the treasure is, there will the heart be also." Yet multitudes fatally err in this matter; they see all things through a vitiated eye, in which phantoms appear realities, and realities phantoms: thus they wander on in darkness, and know not at what they stumble. So that, after all the warnings which Christ has given, they, through unbelief, persist in a vain attempt to "serve God and Mammon." May the Lord preserve us from such false principles and fatal mistakes!

V. 25—34. While we are careful to "choose the good part," to find the right way, to know the state of our souls, and to attend to our present duty, we should not be anxious about future consequences. Let us rely on our heavenly Father, to support the lives and nourish the bodies which he has given us; and not trouble ourselves, whether our provision be plenteous, or mean and scanty. Our "lives are more than meat, and our bodies than raiment;" what then are our souls, which the divine Saviour has redeemed with his precious blood? Whilst we feast on his spiritual provisions, and are adorned with the robes of righteousness and salvation; we cannot surely doubt his truth and love, which are engaged to feed and clothe us! Will he provide for the fowls, and adorn the fading flowers, and yet starve his beloved children? How unreasonable and shameful is our unbelief! We need his merciful rebuke, and should pray continually to him to "increase our faith;" and leave it to Gentiles and unbelievers, to perplex themselves about concerns so far inferior. Let us "seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness," assured that "all things else shall be added to us;" for our Father knows what things we want. Thus we shall be encouraged for every duty, and relieved from our fruitless anxieties. We shall indeed find, that "sufficient for the day is the evil of it;" and that we have no need to anticipate future possible pains and sorrows: but we shall also find, that the day will bring its own comforts and supports with it.—All these rules and precepts of our gracious Lord will be known by our experience, if true believers, to conduce to our present comfort, as well as to our future benefit; when we shall have done with temptation, be delivered from evil, and employed in praising him, whose is "the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen."

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1, 2. These verses do not forbid the magistrate to judge, and pass sentence on criminals; or the rulers of the church to censure and exclude such members as disgrace their profession; or Christians to "withdraw from every brother that walks disorderly:" for these are duties expressly enjoined in scripture. (Notes, 2 Thes. 3:6—15.) In like manner, it cannot be supposed, that our Lord intended to forbid his disciples to form a judgment of men's state and character, according to their avowed principles and visible conduct: for in this very chapter he directs us to judge by this rule: (Note, 15—20.) and indeed, many duties to others absolutely require us to form some judgment, both in respect of their state, and their actions. But we ought not to be officious, rash, or severe, in forming our judgment; nor hasty in declaring it. We are not bound to believe an infidel, or a profligate, to be a true Christian: but we should judge as favourably as we can, where the fundamentals of Christianity are professed, and not disgraced by an inconsistent conduct. We ought to put the best construction on doubtful actions, and never ascribe apparently good ones to bad motives, without full proof; to shun curious inquiries into men's conduct, and injurious suspicions; and steadily to avoid giving our opinion, to any man's disadvantage, without some duty require it of us: we should not censure or anathematize those who differ from us; or condemn whole sects and societies of men, except as the scripture evidently condemns them. We should, as far as we can, shun every thing which savours of malevolence or spiritual pride: for the opinion, which a Christian must form concerning the heart of man, and the state of the world, though he do not needlessly apply it to individuals, will give sufficient offence; and it ought not to be increased, by rash and harsh judgments in particular cases.—He, who

5 [e]Thou hypocrite, [f]first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

6 ¶ Give not [g]that which is holy unto the dogs, neither [h]cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, [i]and turn again and rend you. [Practical Observations.]

7 ¶ Ask, [k]and it shall be given you; [l]seek, and ye shall find; [m]knock, and it shall be opened unto you:

8 For [n]every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened.

9 Or [o]what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?

10 Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?

11 If ye then, [p]being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, [q]how much more shall your Father which is in heaven, give [r]good things to them that ask him!

12 Therefore [s]all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: [t]for this is the law and the prophets. [Practical Observations.] is habitually propense to this self-sufficient, presumptuous, and censorious judging of others, gives them great cause to suspect, that he is devoid of true grace himself, and exposed to "judgment without mercy" from God. If a Christian give in to so evil a spirit and practice, he may expect sharp corrections; nay, both the world and the church will commonly judge of men, according to their method of judging others.—Thus in every sense it is verified, "that with what measure we mete, it will be measured to us again." (Marg. Ref. Note, Jam. 4:11,12.)

V. 3—5. These verses show, that while Christ addressed his disciples as the children of God, he yet warned them that there might be hypocrites among them.—If a man, whose eyes were closed with some obstruction or disease, (which like a beam was evident to all, and which entirely prevented him from seeing any object distinctly,) should affect curiously to spy out some little particle in another man's eye, and officiously offer to remove it; he would render himself ridiculous. His attention ought to be directed to the disordered state of his own eyes, and his endeavours used to remedy it, before he offered his assistance to his brother.—Thus, while Christians should watch over one another, and point out and remedy even small mistakes in each other's principles and practice; the man who presumes to reprove every defect of others, when his own spirit and conduct are notoriously wrong, only proves his own officiousness and hypocrisy. He, who would become a wise and faithful reprover or minister, must begin at home; and first "take heed to himself, and to his doctrine," temper, and conduct: when these are become unexceptionable, he may with propriety, authority, and hope of success, offer his help to his brethren, in rectifying their judgments and promoting their sanctification: yet he will do it with humility, prudence, tenderness, and candour.—But alas! it is observable, that, in spiritual optics, a beam in the eye generally renders a man quick-sighted in discerning other men's faults, and blind only to his own.—It is probable, that our Lord alluded to some proverbial expressions, familiar to his hearers; the knowledge of which would throw more light on the subject, than any criticism on the original words can do.—'There was a proverbial speech among the Jews, in and before Christ's time, (set down afterwards with some variation in the Talmud, thus,) They which say to others, Take out the small piece of wood out of thy teeth, are answered, Take out the beam out of thine eyes: to check the importunity of those, who are always censuring and condemning others for small matters, ... when they themselves are guilty of those things, which are much more to be reprehended.' Hammond.

V. 6. As every man is not qualified or authorized to be a reprover; so every offender is not the proper subject of reproof. (Notes, Prov. 9:7—9. 23:9.) To persevere in giving counsel or instruction to some men would be as improper, as to throw the holy things, which were the food of the priests, unto unclean dogs; or to cast "pearls before swine." The emblems here used, compared with other scriptures, may be supposed to denote hardened scorners, licentious or covetous professors, fierce and untractable opposers, or manifest apostates. (Marg. Ref.) Many truths, and many instances of the Lord's goodness to us, which are precious to the humble and teachable, are not proper to be communicated to scoffers, or those who pervert sacred things: they will only be emboldened or exasperated by them to greater ungodliness, and to show more impious rage and contempt. They will trample under foot, with disdain, all that can be said of experimental religion, or communion with God, as swine would tread pearls in the mire, regardless of their value: and they will be so enraged at holy warnings, reproofs, and counsels, that, like fierce dogs, they will be ready to turn again and tear their friendly reprover.—The rule may also be extended to the preaching of the gospel among those who obstinately contradict and blaspheme; and certainly the admission of openly wicked and ungodly persons to the Lord's supper, and into the sacred ministry, is a too common and most grievous violation of it.

V. 7—11. (Note, Luke 11:5—13.) Many important and arduous duties have been inculcated; and great wisdom and grace would be requisite for the practice of them, without turning aside, or running into extremes, on the right hand or on the left. Our Lord, therefore, next directed and encouraged his auditors, to seek help, and counsel, and every blessing, in earnest prayer, and the use of other means of grace; assuring them that every one who thus asked, sought, and knocked at mercy's gate, would be successful.—But is there no such thing as asking, and not receiving? Undoubtedly there is; yet not in the sense here evidently intended. A man may ask in vain, when he addresses himself to an idol or tutelary saint, instead of the living God: he may ask for what the Lord has never promised; or without feeling any need or desire of the mercy which he craves; he may offer proud and hypocritical prayers; he may pray for exemption from punishment, whilst he wilfully cleaves to sin; he may ask for temporal and spiritual blessings, without using other proper means of obtaining them; or he may come in his own name, in contempt of the appointed Mediator, or in the name of other imaginary mediators. A man may seek the world first, and then attend to religion, as far as it consists with his wordly interests and pursuits; he may seek salvation, in a way of his own devising, or in a more smooth and flattering method than that of the gospel; or he may begin to seek, when "the Master of the house hath risen up and shut to the door:" (Note, Luke 13:22—30. v. 25.) nay, a man may knock at mercy's gate when he is in a fright, and leave off when his fears have subsided. But he who comes as a sinner to a merciful God, through the divine Advocate, for all the blessings of salvation, in sincerity, and with earnest prayer, waiting and persevering, as having hope in this way, and none in any other; he who seeks spiritual blessings in the first place, without delay, and in the use of all appointed means; and he who knocks and waits at mercy's gate, resolved to find admission, or to perish knocking, will be sure at length to succeed. The promise is absolute and express: "Every one that asketh receiveth, &c." Supplicants of this kind sometimes receive, and find admission, without delay; always in due time; nor will their previous character, however bad, preclude them from the benefit; for he who opened the way of access, has taught them to come in it; and "he giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." (Note, Jam. 1:5—8. v. 5.) Indeed, (as our Lord has added,) it would be most dishonourable to God to suppose the contrary, after all the displays which he has given of his fatherly compassion to sinners. For what man would put off his hungry child, when importunately asking food of him, with a useless stone instead of a loaf, or a noxious serpent instead of a fish? He would not deserve the name of a father, or even of a man, who could act in such a manner. If therefore men, who are all corrupt and selfish, and who cannot give to their children without lessening their own store, and often straitening themselves, are yet instructed by natural affection to give salutary and useful gifts to their children; how much more shall our heavenly Father, whose goodness and riches are infinite, give good things, even all things which pertain and conduce to salvation, to every one who humbly asks them from him? Christ does not say, "to his children," lest the trembling supplicant should be disconcerted by the apprehension, that he was not one of them; but he says, "to them that ask him:" thus the very act of asking may give the assurance of being heard, and of receiving the desired mercy.—It is observable, that our Lord assumed it as the principle from which he argued, that even the disciples, as well as others, were evil. "'What man is there among you," in all this numerous assembly, "who, if his son, &c."—This seems to be the emphasis of τις εστιν εξ υμων ανθρωπος. Young preachers will, I hope, observe, how much life and force it adds to these discourses of our Lord, that they so closely are directed, through the whole of them, as an immediate address to his hearers; and are not loose and general harangues in the manner of those Essays, which are now grown so fashionable in pulpits.' Doddridge.

Being evil. (11) Πονηροι οντες. (See on Note, 6:13.) This is a most energetical attestation of the Truth himself, to the doctrine of man's natural depravity and wickedness.

encouragement afforded, and his readiness to pardon, assist, and accept us, constitute the primary argument, with which this rule is enforced, and form its connexion with the preceding verses. It is not only enacted as a strict and holy law; but it is proposed to believers, as their rule of duty, with abundant motives and encouragements; that by observing it, they may glorify God, and show their gratitude for his mercy: and it is worthy of our consideration, that moral precepts, thus enforced, are very different from the same rules of action, when prescribed by human moralists, without authority, sanction, efficacious motive, or promise.—This precept has generally been admired, and called the golden rule: it is indeed equivalent to that of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," and contains the substance of the second table of the law, and of all the exhortations and instructions of the prophets on that subject: for it would be absurd to suppose our Lord meant, that it contained all that was written concerning the love of God, or all the types and prophecies of a Saviour.—'This rule, being given as the sum of the law and the prophets, ... can never duly be so construed, as to subvert any of the laws and orders established by them. ... Therefore it admits these limitations. What I desire ... agreeably to ... the principles of the Christian religion, should be done, or not done to me, that I must do, or not do to others. It therefore will not follow ... that if Socrates would lend his wife to a friend, that friend should do the like to him; because that ... is opposite to ... "the law and the prophets." ... A criminal ... would not have the judge condemn him; ... yet a judge ... must not forbear to condemn; ... since this would take away vindictive justice, and let offenders go unpunished. ... The rule ... requires not the master to obey his servants, because he would have them obedient to him: but to be as obedient to his master as he can reasonably expect they should be to him; and to treat his servants as kindly, ... as ... he could reasonably desire to be treated by his master. And so in the relations of father and children ... &c.—This rule must not be extended to every thing which a man may do lawfully. ... A poor man would desire that some very wealthy person would give him out of his estate enough to make him rich: though were this rich man poor, he would be glad if somebody would show the same kindness to him; yet he is not obliged by this rule, though lawfully he might do it, to make this poor man rich.' Whitby. Certainly we are not required to do to others whatsoever we might unreasonably desire them to do, if we were in their case. But, judging according to the rule of duty in all its latitude, and by the feelings of our own minds, we should suppose ourselves to be precisely in the situation of our neighbour; and then impartially inquire how we might reasonably expect him to behave towards us, if he were exactly in our situation. Every man, at first sight, must perceive, that this would lead to universal justice, truth, goodness, gentleness, compassion, beneficence, forgiveness, and candour; and exclude every thing of an opposite nature. If we honestly proceeded in this way, we should seldom need a casuist to teach us how we ought to act towards our neighbours, in any possible relation or circumstance. But alas! even most professed Christians content themselves with doing to others as they are done by; instead of doing those things to others, which they would that others should do to them.—'This maxim will be a proper monitor, in common conversation; ... in negotiation and commerce; ... in cases where others need our compassion and kindness: in censures and reflections on others; ... in provocations; in the several relations of life; ... and in religious differences; ... and the use of such words as Schismatics and Heretics.' Evans's Christian Temper.

V. 13, 14. Our Lord's audience consisted of unestablished disciples, and of the multitude; and both needed to be excited to greater earnestness in the concerns of their souls: for which purpose, he next gave them this important exhortation and solemn warning.—Our passage through life is represented as a journey to the eternal world: and, as there are two places to which men are removed at death; so there are two roads, one to destruction, the other to heavenly happiness. The gate, at which men enter into "the broad road" is very wide, even as wide as the whole fallen race of Adam: for we enter at it, when we are born sinners into a sinful world; and we proceed on that road as long as we live in an unconverted state. As it is broad, it has in it various paths, suited to men's different humours and inclinations. The covetous and the spendthrift · the infidel, the profligate, and the hypocrite; the Antinomian and the Pharisee; the sons and daughters of levity and giddy dissipation; grave designing politicians, and proud philosophers; decent moralists, and infamous debauchees, have their several paths and their select companies: they mutually despise and condemn each other, yet they all help to keep one another in countenance, by agreeing to oppose the holy ways of the Lord. In this "broad way," men walk without trouble, contrivance, or even intention whilst they are pleasing or forgetting themselves, they make progress in it; nay, even when they are wasting their time in sleep or loitering: and as it is thronged by the many, and especially by the rich, wise, noble, and honourable of the world: and as many of its paths are fashionable and creditable; numbers have no suspicion whither it leads, and are highly displeased with those who give them warning: thus at length they fall into destruction. But when a man hears and believes the voice of Christ, speaking by his word and his ministers, he discovers whither this way tends, and feels the necessity of getting out of it; he makes a stand, and determines to proceed no further; and he learns, that by repentance, faith in Christ, and conversion to God and holiness, he may get into another way which leads to life. But "the gate is strait:" sinful pleasures, prospects, interests, and connexions must be relinquished. A man must lay aside his encumbrances, his pride, and darling lusts; he must be humbled, stripped, and emptied; he must break loose from those who would retain him, and force his way through those who would impede his course; he must deny himself, take up his cross, resist temptation, mortify the flesh, endure reproach, earnestly use all the means of grace, and cordially accept of Christ in all his characters and offices; or he cannot get in at this strait gate. After he has entered, "the way is narrow," and, as it were, beset with thorns. It is the direct way of implicit faith and obedience: a Christian cannot pick and choose his path as men do in the broad road, but must go straight forward, turning neither to the right nor to the left; if he do at all turn aside, he will be scourged back again into the narrow path. When he meets an enemy, he must face and overcome him; when he comes to a mountainous difficulty, he must climb over it; if the road be rough, he must still keep in it; and no persecution or tribulation must divert him from it. Therefore, "few there be that find" this way to life. Most men either neglect religion entirely, or rest in forms or notions; or are deluded into some of those more soothing, flattering, and fashionable species of religion, which "Satan, transformed into an angel of light," and "his ministers, transformed into ministers of righteousness," propose to them, when uneasy about their souls. They are deterred by the difficulties to be encountered in entering at the strait gate and treading the narrow way, and by the dread of being thought singular and precise; and they hope to get to heaven at an easier rate: for they do not know or imagine, that this narrow way has its peculiar joys and consolations, which abundantly compensate for its difficulties and trials. Therefore, Christ warned his hearers and all men, to "enter in at the strait gate," without delay and with all earnestness; and to fear nothing so much as being left without: for, though the entrance is difficult, and found only by few, yet all who resolutely attempt it will succeed; and it leads to eternal life, whilst all other ways lead to destruction.—It is surprising how much this plain declaration of Christ has been overlooked by his professed disciples; and how much pains have been taken to soften the apparent asperity of it, and to explain away its evident meaning.—It cannot be inconsistent with the rule of not judging others, to suppose that most men are in "the way to destruction," and to warn and exhort them "to enter in at the strait gate;" when such words as these are found in the scripture, and too plainly commented upon by the worldly and ungodly lives of the multitudes around us. (Notes, 1,2. Luke 13:22—30.)—In all ages hitherto, the real disciple of Christ has been a singular and unfashionable character: and all, who have sided with the majority, have gone on in the broad road to destruction. (Notes, Eph. 2:1—3.)

Christianity has been professed. (Marg. Ref. b, c.) Nothing so much prevents men from entering in at the strait gate, and becoming true Christians, as the carnal, soothing, and flattering doctrine of those who oppose or pervert the truth. (Note, 23:13.) Our Lord, therefore, warned the people to "beware of false prophets." These would come in sheep's clothing; that is, with great appearances of sanctity, and love to men's souls; but inwardly they would be greedy, fierce, and implacable, like "ravening wolves;" they would "teach things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake," and be ready to devour all who opposed their pernicious principles. (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Mic. 3:5—7.) They might "be known by their fruits;" that is by the nature, tendency, and effects of their doctrine, especially as exemplified in their own spirit and conduct, for they would certainly betray themselves, by their selfishness or self-sufficiency, their arrogance or ambition, their eagerness for disputation or persecution, their vehement passions, or imbittered resentment, or by some part of their habitual temper and conduct; being evidently contrary to the mind of Christ, and the disinterested humility, meekness, purity, and love, which characterize his true disciples and ministers.—He who regards Christ's words, will no more expect real good from following unchristian teachers, than he would hope to "gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles." In fact they commonly infect all over whom they acquire influence, with their own corrupt principles, their spiritual pride, their selfishness, their wrath, and malignity. A good tree may indeed be expected to yield good fruit; but a corrupt tree, in the nature of things, must bring forth evil fruit. The habitual conduct of a truly pious man must be good; and the tendency of his example, converse, and instructions, must be beneficial; but the habitual tenor of an unconverted man's actions must be evil, and the effects of his example and doctrine pernicious, however it may be disguised. As, therefore, the judge will shortly decide upon the characters of professed Christians by this rule, and "every tree, that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire;" (Note, 3:7—10.) so we ought to judge, as well as we are able, by the same rule at present. "By their fruits we must know them," and not by their "fair speeches;" nor can they be supposed to be really leading others in the way to heaven, who are manifestly themselves treading the contrary road.—The decent, friendly, and fascinating manners of some, who teach doctrines plainly contrary to scripture, have been thought by many an almost insuperable objection to interpreting the clause, "By their fruits ye shall know them," of the character and actions of false prophets; and no doubt Satan will endeavour, for the credit of his cause, and to give energy to delusion, that "his ministers should be transformed as ministers of righteousness." Yet, in the very passage whence this quotation is made, the apostle declares, that "their end shall be according to their works." (Note, 2 Cor. 11:13—15.) The virtue, or amiableness, for which many Heresiarchs have been celebrated, will not bear examining by the law of God. It consists principally of such "things as are highly esteemed among men;" and is perceived to be connected with habitual disregard of many duties, and indulgence in many evils, when judged of by the word of God. The enlightened Christian will be enabled to see through the sheep's clothing, and detect the concealed wolf by careful investigation.

Corrupt. (17,18.) Σαπρον. 12:33. 13:48. Luke 6:43. Eph. 4:29.

V. 21—23. Christ on this occasion spake, not only as avowedly the King of Israel, the promised Messiah, but with the dignity and authority of the Judge of the world, and the Arbiter of every man's eternal state, from whose decision there could be no appeal; and when we compare this language of conscious majesty and power, with his lowly appearance and external circumstances, and the neglect and contempt to which he was exposed, the contrast is peculiarly striking.—It is implied, that they who do not acknowledge him as their Lord and Master, are not even professedly in the way to heaven; and it is declared, that even of his professed disciples and subjects, who acknowledge him for their Ruler, Teacher, and Saviour, and openly avow their relation to him, some will be excluded from the kingdom of heavenly glory, as not having been true subjects of his kingdom of grace; and that those "who do the will of his heavenly Father," shall be finally and eternally saved.—It is here indispensably necessary to distinguish between the will of God, the Creator and Lawgiver, concerning his rational creatures; and his will, as it concerns us fallen and condemned sinners. The law of "loving him with all our hearts," "and our neighbour as ourselves," without the least allowance for failure, and sanctioned with the most awful curse, is, in the former sense, "the will of God." This "shuts up all men under sin" and condemnation; but God is now become the Saviour of sinners. What then, in revealing himself to sinners as a God of salvation, is his will concerning them? for this is here exclusively spoken of. As "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," it is his will that we should repent, forsake, and hate all sin; believe, submit to, love, and obey his only begotten Son, love one another, and walk in all his ordinances and commandments with an upright heart. His first requirement, in this view, is, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." When this is complied with, all else follows: without it all else is in vain. Obedience in all things is sincerely attempted, and habitually performed, in the general tenor of the true believer's life, from the time that he comes as a sinner to accept of Christ's salvation. In this sense he does the will of God; though he is far from being able to do his will, as the absolute Governor of the world, in such a manner as to be justified by the works of the law. But hypocrites do not sincerely attend to this will of God; and therefore they shall never enter heaven. Nay, the Lord declares, that many, "in that day," (the solemn day of final account and retribution,) even of such as have preached the gospel, prophesied in his name, wrought miracles, cast out devils, will be rejected by him, because they were "workers of iniquity." Not only a single Balaam who prophesied, or a single Judas an apostle, will be thus condemned; but many will plead in vain their profession, gifts, and services, and the miracles which they have wrought in the name of Jesus Christ. He will then disavow all knowledge or approbation of them, as his disciples or servants; he knew them as hypocrites, but he did not accept them; he "never knew them," they were all along hypocrites, and workers of iniquity. (Note, 2 Tim. 2: 19.) They, therefore, will be constrained to depart from the holy Saviour, (whose name they had used and profaned,) with other workers of iniquity, to their own place, under the most aggravated condemnation; (Note, 25:41—46.) for in departing from Christ, the Light and Life of men, they must sink into darkness and despair.

V. 24—27. To impress more deeply the preceding solemn declaration, our Lord closed his discourse with a most affecting comparison. Doubtless he is the Rock, the only sure and tried Foundation on which the church and every believer's soul and hope are built, and "other foundation can no man lay." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) But this is not the subject: for the false foundation not of the infidel or Pharisee, but of the hypocritical disciple, is detected. The persons of whom Christ spake, are not hearers of Plato, of Seneca, of ancient philosophers, of Jewish Rabbies, or of modern deists and moralists: but they "hear his saying," and "call him, Lord, Lord;" and thus they profess to build for eternity a house, or refuge, in which they may be safe in every approaching season of dismay or danger. All else are even still further from the true Foundation.—One of the characters here described resembles a wise man who digs deep, bestows pains, removes the rubbish, finds the rock, and on it lays firmly the foundation of his house; and then he proceeds to raise the superstructure with good materials and sound workmanship, till it is completed. In this he takes up his abode; and soon after storms arise, the winds blow, the rains descend, the floods swell, and the house is vehemently beaten on; but it stands secure amid the fury of the tempest, because "founded on a rock." This wise builder is the true Christian; he comes to Christ, hears his words, and believes 27 And [d]the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it.

28 ¶ And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, [e]the people were astonished at his doctrine;

29 For he taught them as one [f]having authority, [g]and not as the scribes.

them; instructed by the Saviour as his prophet, he trusts in his righteousness, atonement, and mediation. He submits also to him as his Lord, and obeys his commandments from love to his name; he consults him as his Physician, and follows his directions to obtain the health and sanctification of his soul. In short, he says, "Lord, what wouldst thou have me to do?" and he aims to render unreserved obedience. Thus he builds upon the Rock, "in faith working by love;" his soul is upheld by the power and grace of the divine Redeemer; everlasting arms support him amidst the temptations, tribulations, and persecutions of life, and in the hour of death; and he will be safe as in a castle, amidst the convulsions of expiring nature, and during all the solemnities of the day of judgment.—But there is another builder, a foolish man, who professes to build on the same Rock; but for want of care and pains he lays his foundation beside it, upon a quicksand; on this he erects a specious edifice, which greatly resembles the other, and which the superficial observer thinks equally stable; and perhaps it may have even a fairer exterior: but when it is assailed by storms and floods, it falls with a terrible ruin, and the disappointed builder perishes in it. This is the deluded professor of the gospel, who perhaps hears and assents to its doctrines, and learns to speak and dispute about them; nay, associates with Christians, adopts their creed, and possesses gifts, joins in sacred ordinances, and seems to be one of them; but his "knowledge puffeth up," his faith is dead, and he is not obedient. What he does externally, according to the commands of Christ, is done from corrupt, selfish motives, and not from willing subjection to his authority; so that he disobeys where interest, inclination, or reputation require it; his hope is a delusion, he is "a worker of iniquity;" and so builds on the sand without a foundation. This is a common, unsuspected, but fatal delusion; there are many, of various descriptions and discordant sentiments, who thus "hear Christ's sayings, and do them not." Their profession may perhaps stand the lighter gusts of temptation in times of outward peace and prosperity; but the tempest of fierce persecution would make dreadful havoc among these edifices; and the storms of death and judgment will sweep them away, and leave all who take refuge in them, in the deepest ruin, contempt, and misery. (Marg. Ref. d.)—It is argued by some expositors, that our Lord, by the words, "Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, &c." shows that this sermon contains all things needful for salvation; and many conclude that the doctrinal parts of the New Testament are not so needful and important, as these practical instructions. But most certainly the unchangeable God never meant to recommend one part of his revealed will, by disparaging another. And who have ever, in any age, uprightly and unreservedly obeyed these sayings of our Lord, except those who have firmly believed the doctrines of the gospel as more clearly and fully revealed in the apostolical epistles? This sermon, doubtless, contains the grand outlines of Christian practice; and none who, on Christian principles, observe to do according to it, will come short of salvation. But Christian principles, or doctrines, must in many particulars be more fully learned from other parts of the sacred oracles.

V. 28, 29. The multitudes who heard this interesting discourse, were astonished at the wisdom, weight, and energy of Christ's doctrine, and the majesty and authority with which he enforced it. They perceived that his important instructions had a commanding influence on their understandings, consciences, and affections, which forced their conviction and approbation: and that he spake in a very different manner from their scribes, who only inculcated ceremonial observances, external duties, and their own traditions, or those of some renowned Rabbi, in a dry, disputatious, and uninteresting manner.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Whilst we are careful not to "call evil good," or "darkness light;" we should also guard against a censorious spirit, the offspring of pride and petulance; or we shall prepare bitterness for ourselves, and may expect sharp rebukes from God, and harsh censures from man. But why should we, who have so much to be humbled for and to rectify in our own conduct, officiously expose our brother's faults, which perhaps are far less heinous than our own? Rather let us seek for more self-knowledge, a sounder judgment, deeper humility, and grace to walk more circumspectly; that, if we have the opportunity, we may have ability, influence, and tenderness to counsel, caution, and reprove our brethren, with propriety and efficacy.—How unfit must unconverted men be for the ministry! Yet how many such enter into that arduous office, and attempt to take motes out of the eyes of others, without "considering the beam that is in their own eye." The minister of Christ is indeed a reprover by office; and must "rebuke with all authority." It is therefore peculiarly needful for all who aspire after that office, to begin by casting the beam out of their own eye, that they may see clearly to cast out the mote out of their brother's eye." And all engaged in the work, should be very careful not to expose themselves to be retorted upon with "Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye." It should, however, be observed, that a discernible mote in a man's eye, does not disqualify him from casting out a beam from another man's eye: yet many harden themselves in gross sins, or wholly neglect the cautions and reproofs of their ministers, because they see that they also are liable to imperfections!—But prudence and fortitude, as well as a good cause, and a good intention, are requisite for the performance of the office of a reprover: we should expect to meet with unreasonable men, who will scoff at the most precious truths, and rage against the most just and friendly warnings; and we ought therefore to prepare for enduring contempt and persecution with meekness and firmness: and we shall often be constrained to let the proud and impious scorner alone, lest we should drive him to further extremities of madness and blasphemy. But, if holy counsels and warnings should not be thrown away on these hardened offenders, how deplorable is it, when the most sacred ordinances and offices of the church are left open to their profanation, if they choose to do it "for filthy lucre's sake!" Surely this is in the worst sense to "give that which is holy to the dogs, and to cast pearls before swine!"

V. 7—12. Amidst all the evils which we witness, and all the wants, weakness, and folly which we experience, let us give ourselves unto prayer. Thus let the sinner seek reconciliation to God, and the believer, all that he needs for his honourable and comfortable walk with him: but let us seek and pray with earnestness, importunity, and resolute perseverance, and with a believing expectation of success. For the promise is express, that "every one that asketh receiveth:" if therefore men say, that they do ask, seek, and knock, and yet evidently do not obtain, but remain enslaved to their sins, we must conclude, that they either deceive themselves, or mean to deceive others. "Let God be true, and every man a liar:" if men have not, it is "because they ask not, or because they ask amiss," and from some carnal and corrupt motive. We should, therefore, seek wisdom, knowledge, grace, strength, and every good thing, in this appointed way, without regarding objectors or despisers. Let us begin, and go on to the end, resting on the promises; and they will carry us safely through, as they have done immense numbers who are now in glory. Let us never suppose that our heavenly Father would erect "a throne of grace," appoint a Mediator, open a new and living way of access in so wonderful a manner, command us to pray, and incline our hearts to it; and then at last refuse to hear, or give us what would be useless or pernicious, instead of "the Bread of life," and the blessings of salvation. Far be it from us to listen to such suggestions of the enemy; or suspect our merciful God of conduct, which would be a disgrace to one of the sinful race of men! Assured, therefore, of his willingness to "give good things to all that ask him," let us copy the example of his equity, truth, and goodness; and "whatsoever we would that men should do unto us," let us study to "do the same to them," "not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing," but "doing good against evil, and overcoming evil with good."

V. 13—20. We ought constantly to keep in mind the awful truth, that "wide is the gate, and broad the way, which leadeth to destruction, and many there be who go in thereat." If we would serve God, we must be singular, as well as resolute, in religion. We "must be born again, or we cannot see the kingdom of God;" we must believe in Christ, and be in him new creatures, and lead sober, righteous, and godly lives, or we cannot be saved: and facts demonstrate that so "strait is this gate, and narrow this way," that "few there be that find them." Yet "every one that seeketh, findeth, and to him that knocketh," the gate "shall be opened;" and though the way has its difficulties, and is painful to the flesh, yet it has its comforts, "which a stranger intermeddleth not with." The entrance is commonly more arduous than the further progress, to those who set out resolutely: and the hope of heaven, and "joy in the Holy Ghost," combine to render it "the way of pleasantness and the path of peace."—But let all, who would tread this narrow way, beware of those who "prophesy smooth things," who invent easier ways to heaven, and more pleasing to corrupt nature. Such are "ministers of Satan transformed into ministers of righteousness:" these "beguile unstable souls," and prejudice them against the pure religion of Christ, and those who teach it. Whatever specious appearances they assume, they are actuated by ambition, vainglory, avarice, or some corrupt principle, and are "wolves in sheep's clothing." The disciple of Christ, who keeps his Master's character and precepts in view, as the standard of his judgment, will generally see through them. "By their fruits he will know them" from the faithful servants of his Lord, and will not expect to "gather grapes or figs from thorns or thistles." He is fully aware, that a good tree cannot habitually bring forth evil fruit, any more than a corrupt Christ cleanses a leper, 1—4; heals a centurion's servant, and predicts the calling of the Gentiles and rejection of the Jews, 5—13: heals Peter's wife's mother, 14, 15, and many others, fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah, 16, 17: shows in what spirit he ought to be followed, 18—22: calms the tempestuous sea by his word, 23—27: and casts out devils from two possessed men; suffering them to go into the swine, 28—32. The Gergesenes desire him to leave them, 33, 34.

tree can bring forth good fruit; and, looking forward to the time, when "every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit shall be hewn down, and cast into the fire," he will keep at a distance, lest he should be deceived by them.—But alas! most men establish other rules of judgment than the word of God: and a confident tone, a voluble tongue, zeal for some parts of religion in opposition to others, or new notions plausibly dressed up and defended, go much further than a Christian spirit and conversation, and the plain, faithful preaching of the whole doctrine of the gospel: so that "many follow the pernicious ways" of deceivers, "by reason of whom the way of truth is evil spoken of." (Note, 2 *Pet.*2:1—3.)

V. 21—29. We must "cease from man," if we would hear the decision of our future Judge: he assures us, that "not every one who calls him Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom of heaven, but he only that doeth the will of his heavenly Father." Let us remember, that real grace is far more valuable than the most splendid accomplishments, and even than the gift of prophecy and miracles. If the most admired and useful ministers on earth had no better evidence of his conversion, than his abilities and success as a preacher, he would "preach to others and be himself a cast-away;" whilst the meanest believer in his audience, would be received into the mansions of felicity. Let us then take warning by our Lord's solemn admonitions, and "examine ourselves whether we be in the faith," and whether we have that love, without which all other attainments are nothing. (Notes, 1 Cor. 13:) Let us beware not only of infidelity, profligacy, and self-righteousness; but of a dead faith, a formal profession, a perversion of the gospel. Let no man imagine that he builds on the one tried Foundation, who only hears the words of Christ, but does not obey them. Alas! he builds upon the sand, as fatally as the open enemy of evangelical truth: his edifice may rise fair and magnificent; but it will fall when he most wants it: and then his folly will be manifest, his ruin most tremendous. May the Lord make us wise builders for eternity: may we come to Christ, hear and believe his word, and show our faith by our works of conscientious, unreserved obedience. Then we may be sure, that "nothing shall ever separate us from the love of Christ;" and may look forward, with joyful expectation of smiling in the agonies of death, and triumphing when the world shall be one common conflagration.—Finally, may the Lord send forth many preachers, who may declare the same great truths and precepts as Christ did, and with some good measure of his energy, influence, and authority: may the lives and examples of all preachers of the gospel give a sanction to their doctrine, for the conviction of their hearers; and may they, whose "word is as fire, and as the hammer that breaketh the rocks in pieces," every where supplant those who still continue to teach after the formal, lifeless manner of the Scribes and Pharisees of old.

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1—4. In commenting on those miracles, parables, or discourses, which are recorded by more than one of the evangelists, I purpose to be more particular where they first occur, and to reserve only the additional circumstances and variations, to be considered in the other gospels; except where the other evangelists are more full and copious in their narrative.—The harmony of the evangelists has given immense trouble to many expositors, and yet several things remain in great uncertainty. As it is, therefore, a matter of far more difficulty than importance to us, I shall not perplex the reader with conjectures, or attempt exactness in this respect: for we are much more concerned in knowing what Christ said and did, than at what time, or in what order he said and did it. In general, Matthew is supposed to pay more regard to the order of time in his narration, than Mark or Luke. John perhaps was more observant of the regular succession, in his history, than any of the other evangelists: but he chiefly recorded those things, which had not been mentioned by them.—Matthew, however, seems to fix the date of this miracle to the time immediately following the sermon upon the mount, and while Christ was yet surrounded by the multitudes.—The case of the lepers, and the remarkable laws concerning them, have been considered. (Notes, Lev. 13:14:) The leprosy seems to have been commonly inflicted by the immediate hand of God, and not curable by medicine: it excluded a man from public ordinances, and from most of the employments and comforts of society; and it was an emblem of the guilt and dominion of sin, which exclude men from communion with God and his people, and unless removed, must exclude them from heaven. This poor leper was probably convinced, by the report which he had heard of the miracles and doctrine of Jesus, that he was the Messiah, of whom he had read in the books of the prophets: and therefore believing that he could cleanse him, and hoping that he would, he applied to him in this most humble and reverential manner; and his believing expectation was immediately answered. Holy men and holy angels used to decline such worship, as an honour by no means to be paid to them; (Marg. Ref. e.) but Christ never intimated his disapprobation of any who rendered it to him: on the contrary he approved of it in the most decisive manner; which shows that he was conscious of having an undeniable right to divine honour and worship. The touch would have rendered another man ceremonially unclean; but Christ acted as a priest, and more than a priest; and whilst he cleansed the leprosy, he could not contract defilement from it. It is probable, from the charge of secrecy given to the man, that Jesus took him aside from the multitude to cleanse him. This seems to have been done, in order to avoid all appearance of ostentation in his miracles, which could not but be known sufficiently: perhaps he would not needlessly exasperate his enemies, and excite them to hasten their designs against his life, before the appointed time. But, that the cure might be authenticated, and, as it were, registered; as well as that honour might be put upon the ordinances of the Mosaic law, which was still in force, Christ ordered the man to go, and show himself to the priest, and offer the appointed sacrifices; which would bring the priests acquainted with the miraculous cure wrought by him, and might be a testimony to them that he was the promised Messiah.—'Christ, in healing of the leprous with the touching of his hand, showed that he abhorreth no sinners that come to him, be they never so unclean.' Beza.

V. 5—7. A centurion was the captain of a hundred men, in the Roman legions: these were not composed of the lowest of the people, but of reputable citizens; and therefore a centurion was considerably higher in rank than a captain in our armies.—It is probable, that this man was of good family and fortune; he was a soldier, educated a heathen, and a Roman: and most of his countrymen, and fellow soldiers, exceedingly despised the Jews and their religion. Yet, his lot being cast by Providence in that part of the Roman empire, (probably without his own choice,) his prejudices had been obviated, he had become acquainted with the scriptures, and was evidently a humble and spiritual worshipper of the God of Israel, though not a proselyte to the Mosaic law. He had also conceived the highest esteem of the people of God, and affection for them; and by his good conduct, for some considerable time, he had overcome the prejudices of the Jews against him as a Gentile, and as an officer in the army which held their nation in subjection. (Note, Luke 7:1—10.) His tender concern likewise about his servant, when sick, should be considered as the effect of his religion; by which he had probably won over some of his domestics also to the worship of God. He had, no doubt, before this heard of the miracles and doctrine of Christ, and perhaps of a similar miracle wrought on the nobleman's son; (Notes, John 4:46—54.) and he had conceived the most exalted ideas of his dignity and excellency, as the promised Messiah and the King of Israel: so that when his servant, whom he much valued, was seized with a palsy, which not only disabled him from his business, but filled him with extreme pain: he hoped for his cure by a miracle, and applied to Jesus for that purpose.—We learn from St. Luke, that he did not come himself, at least not at the first: but that he humbly sent the elders of the Jews, and afterwards his friends: yet some think, that at 7 And Jesus saith unto him, [r]I will come and heal him.

8 The centurion answered and said, Lord, [s]I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof: [t]but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed.

9 For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me: and I say to this man, [u]Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, [x]Do this, and he doeth it.

10 When Jesus heard it, [y]he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily, I say unto you, [z]I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.

11 And I say unto you, [a]That many shall come from the east and west, and shall [b]sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, [c]in the kingdom of heaven.

12 But [d]the children of the kingdom shall [e]be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

13 And Jesus said unto the centurion, [f]Go thy way; [g]and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. [h]And his servant was healed in the self-same hour. [Practical Observations.]

15 And he [l]touched her hand, and the fever left her: and she arose, [m]and ministered unto them.

16 ¶ When [n]the even was come, [o]they brought unto him many that were possessed with devils: [p]and he cast out the spirits with his word, [q]and healed all that were sick:

Centurion. (5) Ἑκατοντάρχος. (Εκ ἑκατον, centum, and ἀρχος, princeps.)—My servant. (6) Ὁ παις μου. Gr. but a servant of a superior order, and in special favour. In a few instances it may be doubted which it denotes. 12:18. Luke 1:54,69. Acts 4:25.—Sick of the palsy.] Παραλυτικος. 4:24. 9:2,6. Mark 2:3—5,9,10. (Der. from παραλυω, dissolvo, debilito.) This disease is not mentioned in the Old Testament.

V. 8, 9. The centurion, surprised perhaps at our Lord's condescension, and prompt attention to his request; so contrary to the general spirit and conduct of the Jews; and deeply conscious of his own sinfulness, regarded himself as unworthy to receive a visit from so holy and eminent a person; and considered his house (the residence of a Gentile) an improper place for him to enter.—When we remember, that Christ appeared in all respects as a poor Jew, "who had not where to lay his head;" and that this man was a Roman, of that victorious nation to which the Jews were subject, and one that lived in affluence; we shall perceive that his humble reverence of Christ was, in every respect, extraordinary.—He added, that it was in no wise necessary for Jesus thus to demean himself, for he could remove the disease by a word spoken at a distance. This he illustrated by his own case: he was only an inferior officer, subject to the authority of his tribune and his general: yet, having a company of soldiers under his command, he found them prompt to obey his orders, whether delivered on the spot, or sent to them at a distance; and, in like manner, his servant implicitly obeyed his word: much more then would diseases obey the command of him, who was "the King of glory" and "the Lord of all." We can hardly conceive of a higher expression of confidence in the power of Christ, as "the Son of God," and as possessed of unlimited authority, than this was.—'If I, who am subject to the power of another, have so much power over my servants, that they instantly do whatever I would have them: how much more shall all things which thou requirest be done at thy command, who art subject to the power of none! And how can we deny him to be God, in whom shines forth that divine power, which God exerted in the creation of the world; and at whose word all things that he commandeth must be done; and who is subject to the power of none?' Woltzogenius in Whitby.

V. 10—12. 'Christ, by setting before them the example of the uncircumcised centurion, and yet of an excellent faith, provoketh the Jews to emulation, and ... forewarneth them of their casting off, and the calling of the Gentiles.' Beza.—Our Lord might have commended many things in the centurion's character and conduct; but he specially expressed an entire approbation of his unwavering faith, as one surprised at it, considering all the disadvantages under which, as a Gentile, he had laboured. Thus he emphatically instructed the people, that he best approved of those who formed the most exalted apprehensions of him, and expected the most from him: and that they could not honour him more than was right, and due to him. He affirmed, that he had not found such strong faith, even in Israel, where it might have been most expected; no, not so much as among his own disciples! and hence he took occasion to declare, that many of the benighted Gentiles, from the distant parts of the earth, would, by faith in him, become fellow-heirs with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of that heavenly felicity, to the enjoyment of which they had attained; whilst the Jews, "the children of the kingdom," who had so long enjoyed the peculiar privileges of God's people, to whom the gospel was first to be preached, and who supposed themselves exclusively entitled to the blessings of Messiah's kingdom, would be excluded from the church, and left in a dark and wretched condition: and that numbers of them would be shut out of heaven, and left to final wickedness, misery, and despair; where they would in vain weep, and gnash their teeth in rage and anguish, recollecting what happiness they had lost, and what ruin they had incurred, by their unbelief and folly.—The future state must exclusively be meant. 'It cannot be said, with any propriety, either that the holy patriarchs share with Christians in the present privileges of the gospel-state; or that the Jews weep and wail, on account of their being excluded from them.' Doddridge.

Gnashing. (12) Βρυγμος· (a βρυχω, frendeo, Acts 7:54.) 13:42,50. 22:13. 24:51. 25:30. Luke 13:28.

V. 13. The centurion seems by this time to have joined the company: our Lord therefore addressed him: and it was found that the servant was perfectly cured, at the time when he spake the words.

V. 14, 15. This miracle was wrought on the sabbath-day after our Lord and his disciples returned from the synagogue. (Mark 1:29—31. Luke 4:38,39.) It seems, that Peter and his brother Andrew had a house at Capernaum; that Peter's wife's mother was one of the family; and that our Lord lodged there, when in that city. In his absence, she had been seized with a violent fever, which confined her to her bed: but Jesus, on his return, went to her, and rebuked the fever; (as a man would do his servant, who was going beyond his orders; Note, 8,9.) which immediately obeyed his word and left her. Thus she was able, without delay, to arise, and wait upon him and his disciples, being, in a moment, perfectly restored to full health and strength! This is well known to be wholly different, from the experience of those who, in an ordinary way, recover from violent fevers: for extreme debility universally succeeds to the paroxysm of the disease.

Sick of a fever. (14) Πυρεσσουσαν. Mark 1:30. Α πυρετος, 15, hocque a πῦρ, ignis.

V. 16, 17. (Marg. Ref.) The Jews began their sabbaths in the evening, at sunset, and ended them at the same time the next day. The people were restrained, by regard to the sabbath, from bringing their sick and demoniacs, till it was over: but the miracles which Christ had wrought, being noised abroad, might induce them thus to throng to him in the evening: and Jesus, not complaining of weariness from the labours of the day, or of the unseasonableness of the hour, restored all the demoniacs to the perfect use of their faculties, and to mental composure: as well as healed all the other sick persons. Thus the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled: (Note, Is. 53:4—6.) for though the prophet more directly predicted the sufferings of Christ on the cross for our sins: yet all the labours, fatigues, and sorrows of his whole life, were willingly submitted to out of compassion to sinners, and formed a part of his humiliation as our Surety. Sickness, and the power of the devil, are effects of sin; and he suffered to deliver us from sin and all its consequences. So that, in thus denying himself, that he might relieve demoniacs and sick persons, for the confirmation of the gospel, he might truly be said, "to take our infirmities and bear our sicknesses;" that is, to endure pain and uneasiness himself, in order to deliver others from them. 'He himself bears our sins, and travails in pain concerning us.' Is. 53:4. Sept.

V. 18—20. When great multitudes were gathered about about him, he gave commandment to depart [u]unto the other side.

19 And [x]a certain scribe came, and said unto him, Master, [y]I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest.

20 And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes have holes, [z]and the birds of the air have nests; but [a]the Son of man hath not where to lay his head.

21 And [b]another of his disciples said unto him, Lord, [c]suffer me first to go and bury my father.

22 But Jesus said unto him, [d]Follow me; [e]and et the dead bury their dead.

23 ¶ And when he was [f]entered into a ship, his disciples followed him.

24 And, behold, [g]there arose a great tempest in the sea, insomuch that the ship was covered with the waves: [h]but he was asleep.

25 And his disciples came to him, [i]and awoke him, saying, Lord, [k]save us; we perish.

26 And he saith unto them, [l]Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose, [m]and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm.

27 But the men [n]marvelled, saying, What manner of man is this, that even the winds and the sea obey him? [Practical Observations.]

28 ¶ And [o]when he was come to the other side into the country of the [p]Gergesenes, there met him two possessed with devils, [q]coming out of the tombs, exceeding fierce, [r]so that no man might pass by that way.

29 And, behold, they cried out, saying, [s]What have we to do with thee, Jesus, [t]thou Son of God? art thou come hither to [u]torment us before the time?

Jesus, and it might have been supposed, that he would instruct them; he either perceived, that they were indisposed to profit, and that he had taught them as much as they could at that time receive and digest; or he meant to put their sincerity to the trial, and to procure leisure for necessary relaxation: he therefore gave orders to his disciples to cross the sea of Tiberias. On this occasion, a scribe, or interpreter of the law and the traditions, (Marg. Ref. x.) came to him, offering to become his constant follower. He seems to have been convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, and to have admired his discourses: and, having imbibed some confused ideas of his dignity and authority, he probably built his hopes of future preferment and consequence, on joining him at so early a period; perhaps expecting, that Christ would gladly accede to his proposal, seeing he was as yet only followed by unlearned fishermen, and others of low rank in life. But, probably, our Lord saw that he was actuated by ambition and carnal motives, and that he had not counted his cost: he therefore discouraged his proposal, intimating that it would not answer his expectations: for though the meanest of the wild beasts and birds of the air had their abode, to which they retired for repose and safety; yet he, "the Son of man, during his humiliation in human nature, had not where to lay his head," even when wearied with labour, and needing the refreshment of sleep His disciples, therefore, must expect to be equally destitute, to endure hardship, and to be recompensed by spiritual advantages alone.—It is likely, that this intimation sufficed, and induced the scribe to abandon his design. (Note, Luke 9:57—62.)

V. 21, 22. Another person also, who had followed Christ as his disciple, was called to a more constant attendance on him, that he might be sent forth to preach his gospel; but for the present he desired to excuse himself, requesting leave to attend on the funeral of his father, who was just deceased: for Christ's answer seems to imply that this was his request; and not that he might stay with an aged parent till his death, as some explain it. But our Lord perceived that he had some reluctancy to the self-denying service appointed for him, which might have been increased by going to bury his father, and associating with his relations: and at the same time he purposed to show, that all personal and relative concerns must give place to his command, and our attachment to him and his cause. He therefore would not grant his request: but ordered him to leave that care to his relatives, who were dead in sin, and incapable of spiritual services; (Marg. Ref. e.) but could order every thing needful for the burial of the dead, and would give due attention to it.—'The dead, in scripture, often signify ... those, who in a spiritual sense are so, by being "alienated from the life of God," and "dead in trespasses and sins."—Here then Christ teacheth, that when we are called by him to the promotion of the gospel, and the salvation of men's souls, we must not suffer earthly business, which may be done as well by others, who are unfit to be employed in spirituals, to give us the least hinderance from setting instantly upon that work.' Whitby.

V. 23—27. The evangelists Mark and Luke relate this and what follows in a different connexion. Christ, however, having entered the ship, or fisher-boat, which the disciples had provided, set sail, being accompanied by some other small vessels: (Note, Mark 4:35—41.) but instead of the fair voyage, which probably they expected, they were overtaken with a terrible storm: so that the ship was speedily covered with the waves, and apparently ready to sink; yet amidst all this confusion and distress, Jesus lay fast asleep. His human nature, like ours in every thing but sin, was wearied with incessant fatigue; and he willingly yielded to sleep, foreseeing the storm, that his power might thus be more noticed. But the disciples, trembling lest they should be swallowed up by the waves, and having no resource but in his power, came and awoke him; saying "Lord, save us; we perish." Considering all which they had seen of his power, this was comparatively weak faith; and their fears were evidences of much remaining unbelief. It was impossible that the vessel which carried him could sink; and, in his divine nature, he was as able to restrain the winds and waves, when his human nature lay asleep, as to cure the paralytic by a word spoken at a distance. Having therefore first rebuked them, as men "of little faith;" he next, with the authority of the Lord and Governor of the creation, rebuked the winds and waves; (as a master would rebuke a company of unruly servants:) and at his omnipotent word, the winds suddenly ceased to blow, the tempestuous sea (contrary to its nature) immediately became smooth, and a perfect calm succeeded. This filled the disciples with the greatest astonishment; and they said to each other, "What manner of Person is this?" (Ποταπος εστιν ουτος;) 'No doubt he is more than man; for with divine "authority, he commands even the winds and waves, and they obey him!"'—Thus the tempest, which threatened their destruction, was overruled to the increase of their faith, and admiration of the majesty and power of their Lord. (Marg Ref. m.)—'It being so often made the property of God, to stil the raging of the sea; ... it is not to be wondered at, that Christ's disciples should conceive there must be a divine power in him, who could perform such things.' Whitby.

(Comp. of ολιγος, little, and πιστις, faith.) 6:30. 14:31. 16:8. Luke 12:28. A word peculiar to the New Testament.

V. 28, 29. The country of the Gergesenes included in it the region of Gadara. It seems to have been inhabited chiefly by Jews, but surrounded by Gentiles, who mixed much with the inhabitants.—The other evangelists on this occasion mention but one demoniac; probably, because one was more remarkable than the other, both before and after his cure; but they do not say that there was no more than one: this, therefore, is no real disagreement. (Notes, Mark 5:1—20. Luke 8:26—39.)—The circumstances of this narration (like those of several others) plainly prove the reality of possessions by evil spirits; for such things were said and done by these demoniacs, and such events took place in consequence of their dispossession, as one would think no man could ascribe to lunacy, who was himself in his sober senses. But a main point of modern Sadduceism consists in denying the existence or agency of apostate spirits; and they carry on their designs best in the dark, and maintain their empire most successfully, by promoting this kind of infidelity. Some however, who are not skeptical in other respects, are unwilling to admit the reality of these possessions. But it cannot be thought that Satan and his angels want power and malice to distract men's minds and torment their bodies, as well as to tempt them to sin, if God were pleased to permit them: nor can it be ascertained how far they have influence in producing or increasing diseases, which affect both body and mind. Even, if they do not in any instance immediately cause lunacies, or other maladies, it cannot be denied upon scriptural principles, that they may take the advantage of the disordered state of the body, to disturb and terrify the mind, and to augment the effects. (Notes, Job 1:6,7. 2:6.) But when Christ was "manifested to destroy the works of the devil," there was a peculiar propriety and wisdom in leaving that great enemy of God and man at greater liberty; that he might show his power and malice, and the tendency of his efforts to render mankind miserable, and to destroy them: and that Christ might have the fuller opportunity to show his superior power and authority; to give conclusive evidence of the existence of these spirits, in opposition to the infidelity of the Sadducees; and to evince the beneficent intention of his gospel.—'Some are of opinion ... that these were only persons afflicted with strange diseases: but this cavil may be evidently confuted. ... The Scriptures ... make a plain and evident distinction between ... curing diseases, and casting out devils. (4:24.) ... This will be farther evident from many circumstances, relating to the devils being cast out. (Mark 1:34. Luke 4:41. 8: 27,33.) Now to make all these sayings the effects of a disease, or to conceive that Christ spake this to a disease, is too great an evidence of one that is himself diseased. ... Christ sometimes puts questions to these demons, asking their names, &c. The demoniacs were of such strength that no chain or fetters could bind them. ... The diseased persons could not fear being destroyed, tormented, sent out of the country, or into the abyss, by Christ.' Whitby.—Some persons argue, as if the Evangelists wrote under the influence of Jewish prejudices, nay, as if our Lord spake and acted, on these occasions, with some regard to them! But this argument is suited entirely to subvert the authority of the inspired writers, and most awfully reflects on the conduct of Christ. Where Jewish opinions were the effect of error and prejudice, he never failed most decidedly to oppose and counteract them. (Notes, 15:3—6. Acts 16:16—18.)—Having premised these remarks, the exceeding fierceness of these demoniacs calls for attention: for they could not be confined, but wandered in the tombs, or solitary places, without the cities and villages, and were the terror of the country, so that "no man could pass by that way." Yet, when they saw Christ, the evil spirits knew and dreaded him; and, using the men's organs of speech, (as Satan of old spake by the serpent,) they cried out aloud, "What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God?" They expected no benefit from him, they declined all contest with him, they desired to have nothing to do with him.—'O thou Jesus, the Son of the ever-living God, it is our great misery, that we are fallen into thy hands. What wilt thou now do with us? Dost thou mean now to accomplish our full torture before the day of judgment?' Bp. Hall. Thus owning that their doom was fixed, but desiring longer respite and liberty for mischief.

V. 30—32. Swine were unclean animals by the Mosaic law, and the very touch of them, when dead, defiled a man. Note, Lev. 11:31—33, v. 31.) yet the Gadarenes fed them in great numbers, to sell to their Gentile neighbours. The evil spirits, therefore, being reluctant to quit a region, where their influence had been so entire, formed a subtle plan of prejudicing the inhabitants against Jesus, that they might be induced to reject his instructions. Aware of the value which was put upon the swine because of the gain arising from them, they requested permission to possess those animals: and he, probably to punish the avarice of the Gadarenes, to give a decisive proof of the reality of possessions, and to show the destructive rage and power of evil spirits, as well as the limits assigned to their influence, permitted them. Immediately, therefore, they impelled the swine to such fury, that the whole herd rushed from a precipice into the sea, and was drowned.—It is surprising, that any should have thought this permission, either a ground of objection against our Lord's conduct, or requiring a laboured vindication. Had not his almighty power restrained the evil spirits, they would have destroyed not only the demoniacs, but also the guilty owners and feeders of the swine: so that his mercy was truly wonderful and adorable, in protecting the persons of the Gadarenes, and permitting only the destruction of that property which they kept from avarice, and by living under constant temptation to violate the law, and almost under a necessity of continually contracting ceremonial uncleanness. But the objection reminds us of one most important fact; viz. that the enemies of Christianity always throw the blame on our holy and beneficent religion, of all the mischief which the devil and wicked men have taken occasion from it to perpetrate; forgetting, that they would have done vastly more mischief, had its restraints been removed. Indeed, if permitting be not clearly distinguished from commanding or causing; it will be impossible to avoid imputing to the just and holy God, the sins of all his rebellious creatures, which is the most detestable blasphemy that can be conceived. (Marg. Ref.)—A steep place. (32) Του κρημνου. Mark 5:13. Luke 8:33.—A precipice, or overhanging cliff.

V. 33, 34. It must be supposed, that the keepers were exceedingly affrighted, as well as astonished, at this strange event: and having reported it in the city Gadara, the inhabitants in general came to Jesus: not however to receive instruction, implore protection, or crave miraculous assistance. Probably, their guilty consciences made them dread his power, and the loss of the swine no doubt highly displeased them: yet, not venturing to attempt violence against so extraordinary a person, they presented one single request to him, namely, "that he would depart out of their coasts;" which was in fact to say, "What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God?" This proved them to be under the power of Satan fully as much as the demoniacs had been, but in another and more criminal sense.—'Where men live like swine, there doth not Christ tarry, but devils.' Beza.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. The various diseases of our bodies, which entered by sin and end in death, are faint emblems of those which disorder our souls, and must issue in final misery unless cured by the heavenly Physician: for all other help is totally unavailing. But men feel sickness, and desire deliverance from it; and willingly incur expense, and use unpleasant means, to procure it: while few are sensible of their misery as sinners, or bestow proper pains to obtain a cure!—Were the divine Saviour to return to the earth, and renew his beneficent miracles; he would again be surrounded with multitudes, earnestly beseeching him to relieve their pains and heal their diseases: but he is ever present with us, ready to save us from sin, and to make us holy and happy: yet alas! few are willing to come to him for it; though he confers his benefits "without money or price;" though he never refuses aid to any that ask it, and effectually heals all who wait upon him!—Those are blessed afflictions which bring us acquainted with Christ, and cause us to seek salvation from him. If we have discovered that we are polluted with spiritual leprosy and are humbled on that account; we need not fear being disappointed, in seeking to Christ to cleanse us, however inveterate our maladies have become. He did not indeed take our nature upon him, on purpose to cleanse leprous bodies, but leprous souls: we need not then say, "If thou wilt," for we may as fully rely on his willingness as on his power. Let us then wait on him with humble supplications, confessing how vile and miserable we are, and adoring his power and grace: in due time he will speak the word, "I will, be thou cleansed:" and the effect will as surely follow as when he said, "Let there be light, and there was light." Nor should we conceal our obligations to his cleansing power; but rather proclaim them to his glory, that other lepers may hear, and apply to him also.—We should likewise copy the example of his humility, and learn to do good to the mean and to the wretched, without ostentation.—But if men purpose to honour and obey their Benefactor, they must attend on all the ordinances of God: when, in the judgment of faithful ministers, they are indeed cleansed from the guilt and dominion of their sins, they should, at the Lord's table, offer their spiritual sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, and join themselves to his people; and this will turn to a testimony, for the instruction of their neighbours also; and even for the edification and encouragement of the ministers of Christ.

V. 5—13. Eminent examples of faith and piety are sometimes met with, where least to be expected: and, when those who have religious advantages, and even the ministers of religion, turn away from Christ; soldiers and others, whose education and mode of life cast them at an apparent distance from the gospel, embrace and adorn it. In this the sovereignty of grace is displayed: and often those removals, to which men are most reluctant, or which have been most casual, or made from secular motives, are overruled by Providence, to bring them acquainted with the word and people of God.—Where true religion governs the heart, it regulates the life, and renders men exemplary in relative duties: and thus it promotes domestic comfort, while it glorifies God and saves the soul.—Pious, faithful, and affectionate servants are great and important blessings from the Lord, and ought to be very dear to us: and surely, if we have the benefit of their service, when in health, we should not desert them in their sickness, or neglect to procure for them all the relief and solace in our power.—True piety is always connected with deep humility: the more we know of God, and of his law and truth, the more carefully we examine our hearts and lives, according to this rule; and the more we commune with God, and are sensible of our obligations to him, the deeper will be our self-abasement, and the more unreservedly shall we "sit down in the lowest place," and subscribe even to those degrading opinions which others have formed of us, perhaps out of prejudice and mistake. But, if we proportionably "know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," we shall not be discouraged: for we shall per-

CHAPTER IX.

Jesus returning to Capernaum, 1, heals one sick of the palsy, 2—8; calls Matthew from the receipt of custom, 9; justifies himself for eating with publicans and sinners, 10—13; and his disciples for not fasting like the Pharisees, 14—17; is intreated by a ruler to heal his daughter, 18, 19; heals a woman of an inveterate issue of blood, 20—22; raises the ruler's daughter, 23—33; gives sight to two blind men, 27—31; and casts a devil out of a dumb man, 32. The people wonder, but the Pharisees ascribe it to the prince of the devils, 33, 34. Jesus compassionates the multitudes, and preaches to them; and charges his disciples to pray, that labourers might be sent forth into the harvest, 35—33.

AND [a]he entered into a ship, and passed over, and came into [b]his own city.

2 And, behold, [c]they brought to him a man sick of the palsy, lying on a bed: and Jesus [d]seeing their faith, said unto the sick of the palsy; [e]Son, [f]be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee.

3 And, behold, [g]certain of the scribes said within themselves, [h]This man blasphemeth.

4 And Jesus [i]knowing their thoughts said, [k]Wherefore think ye evil in your hearts?

5 For [l]whether is easier to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, [m]Arise, and walk?

ceive that he is ever ready to help the most unworthy. He is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever:" he is still ready to hear all our petitions: and though we are consciously unworthy that he should come under our roof, or dwell in our hearts; yet he will come at our desire, and bring salvation with him. At his powerful word, the strongest evil habits and propensities are subdued, as palsies and fevers were of old; and then strength, liberty, victory, peace, and holiness succeed. The more we honour his power and grace, the more evident tokens of his approbation and favour shall we receive; and the answer of our prayers will generally bear proportion to the degree of our genuine faith.—What cause have we, in these distant western regions, to rejoice, that we are called by his gospel to enter into his family, to walk with him, and ere long to "sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven!" But let us also remember, that we now are "the children of the kingdom:" let us take warning by the example of the benighted, wretched Jews: let us "not be high-minded, but fear," lest any of us should fall from our height of privilege, through unbelief, and be cast into that outer "darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth;" whilst the Lord shall replenish his church by the conversion of the heathen, or of the most abject sinners in our communities.

V. 14—22. Those who are confined from public ordinances by sickness, or by any other real hinderance, and to whom this is an affliction, may expect the Saviour's gracious presence with them in retirement, and that he will sooth their sorrows, and abate their pains.—When our maladies are cured, even by ordinary methods, we should arise and minister to Christ and his people; giving him praise as our Healer, and dedicating our health and strength to his service: and when he rebukes and removes the fever of our sinful passions, we shall delight in doing his will. He never deems any hour unseasonable, at which we come to him to deliver us from temptation or trouble: nor should we excuse ourselves from helping others, because it is late, or we are fatigued, when the case is urgent and the opportunity favourable.—Whilst we rejoice in the salvation of Christ; let us remember the pain, labour, and suffering, which he endured, when "himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses" and sins: that we may not grudge labour, and weariness, and expense, in doing good to others.—But let us contrast the divine majesty and glory of our Redeemer, with the external poverty and destitute condition to which he voluntarily submitted. Was he weary, and without a place where he might recline his sacred head? Was he even more destitute than "the foxes, or the birds of the air?" And shall we absurdly aim to render his religion subservient to our secular interests and preferments; and to preach or profess the gospel in order to grow rich or great? Shall we deem honour, excellence, or happiness to be connected with affluence, splendour, and indulgence? Shall we pay court to the wealthy because of their wealth, or despise the poor on account of their poverty? Shall we "seek great things for ourselves;" or be discontented with mean accommodations, though far better than our Saviour's were? God forbid! His disciples must not only profess a readiness "to follow him whithersoever he goeth;" but they must be ready to accompany him, by sea and land, through storms and tempests, through poverty, hardship, reproach, and persecution: otherwise they will never hold out to the end. If he requires our service, even the most endeared relative affections, and such things as would otherwise have been our duty, must give place. Enough will be found to attend on other employments, and to take care of the ordinary affairs of families and communities: but he, who is called to follow Christ, and preach his gospel, must leave "the dead to bury their dead;" and not allow secular concerns to take him off from his high and important work.

V. 23—27. Even when following Christ in the path of duty, we may expect to meet with tribulations, nay, to be menaced with impending destruction. Satan will then especially endeavour to obstruct our course, or dismay our souls, by raising some tremendous storm; and the Lord may see good to permit him, for our humiliation and the trial of our faith. But, though the Saviour seems to sleep, and disregard his church and the believer, when conflicting with the winds and waves of temptation or persecution, and apparently ready to be overwhelmed; yet his presence infallibly secures their safety: and he only purposes to excite their more earnest prayers for deliverance, and their more simple and entire dependence on him for it. Even weak faith will induce us to cry out, "Lord, save us, we perish:" but our terrors in danger, comparatively small, often prove our faith to be little, which at other times has seemed to be strong; nay, Christ often accounts that little faith, of which we had a far higher opinion. He will not leave the weak believer to perish: but he will rebuke him for his unbelieving fears; and show his disapprobation of his conduct, when he dishonours him by distrusting his truth and love: and he leads men into perilous circumstances, both to detect the weakness of their faith, and the greatness of his own power, whom winds and waves, and all creatures implicitly obey; and thus increase and invigorate their faith, and excite their admiring and adoring love.

V. 28—34. The power and malice of apostate angels might justly alarm and dismay us, were it not for the superior power and grace of our Redeemer. We bar our doors, with great care, against a few ruffians of our own species; but we seldom reflect that there are legions of devils, which have constant access to us, against whose assaults we have no method of defence: and whilst they are able, if permitted, to distract our minds, disorder, torment, or kill our bodies, or destroy our possessions, their only delight is in misery and destruction. In what an awful situation then are they, who by daily listening to their temptations, provoke God to give them up to their power and malice! And what cause have we for gratitude, for being preserved during the unconverted part of our lives!—But the believer, in the path of duty, needs not fear these roaring lions and wolves, being safe under the watchful care of the almighty Shepherd. They cannot break that hedge of protection, which is placed about his people: nay, they cannot enter even a swine without his leave. (Note, Job 1:9—11.) They can tempt sinners to destroy themselves, yet they have no power to destroy them. Spiritual possession by these unclean spirits is, however, most to be dreaded; their influence tends to make men miserable and mischievous, the burden of their families, and the nuisance or terror of society. Under their fascinating delusions, the poor sinner imagines that religion can only make him uneasy: and if he have some notions of the truth, and suppose "Jesus to be the Son of God," nay, if he have any dread of future torment; he will yet have nothing to do with the Saviour, but shuns the gospel, "lest it should torment him before the time." But Jesus gives deliverance to such wretched slaves, and makes them willing to be his servants, whenever he sees good, notwithstanding all the opposition of the powers of darkness. (Note, Ps. 110:3.)—Even "devils believe and tremble:" nay, they can become supplicants to Christ, to be exempted from torments or permitted to do mischief! Let none then trust in notions, dead faith, or selfish prayers; or in any thing short of "faith that worketh by love."—There is nothing, be it ever so base and filthy, which men will not do for money; (Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 8—10.) and nothing more prejudices the mind against the gospel, than its interference with the pursuit of riches by unlawful means. The covetous prove, that they are possessed by Satan, and enemies to Christ, equally with the most abandoned depredators or debauchees. Nay, perhaps, confirmed avarice is more rarely extirpated, than any other distemper of the soul. All that such men hear of the power and grace of Christ, only excites fears and anxiety about their ungodly gain: they want to rid the country of him and his ministers, that they may possess and increase their wealth without fear of consequences; and they copy the example of the Gadarenes, who loved their swine better than the Saviour, or their own souls. From such possession and insanity, good Lord, deliver us!

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1. This verse should have been placed at the end of the foregoing chapter, being the conclusion of the narrative there recorded. (Note, Mark 2:1,2.)—Capernaum, not Nazareth, was at this time our Lord's own city. (Note, 4:12—17.)—'Bethlehem brought him forth, Nazareth brought him up, and Capernaum was his dwelling-place.' Theophylact.—The miracle next recorded was indeed wrought at Capernaum; but it appears from the other Evangelists to have taken place before our Lord's voyage to Gadara.

V. 2—8. (Notes, Mark 2:3—12. Luke 5:17—26.) This miracle is much more fully recorded by the other Evangelists; and the more particular consideration of it is therefore postponed. Mark records several miracles more circumstantially than Matthew does: from which it is evident, that he did not extract his gospel from Matthew, as some have supposed. (Preface to Mark.) Matthew seems in this place to record several miracles, wrought at different times, in one continued

11 And when the Pharisees saw it, [x]they said unto his disciples, [y]Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners?

12 But when Jesus heard that, he said unto them, [z]They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.

13 But [a]go ye and learn what that meaneth, [b]I will have mercy and not sacrifice: for I am not come [c]to call the righteous, [d]but sinners to repentance.

14 ¶ Then came to him [e]the disciples of Joh saying, [f]Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not?

15 And Jesus said unto them, [g]Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, [h]when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, [i]and then shall they fast.

'Thou art come hither, in desire and confidence of cure; I will give thee more than thou askest; ... a happy restitution to a good estate of soul: thy palsy is healed, thy sins (the cause of it) are forgiven thee.' Bp. Hall.—Some think, that our Lord remitted only the temporal punishment of this man's sins; and the chief argument which they use in confirmation of this opinion is, that the apostles cured diseases; so that this could be no proof of authority to forgive sins, as to the eternal punishment. But the apostles healed diseases, in the name of Christ; and they forgave sins by the authority of Christ: (16:19. John 20:23.) and he did both, in his own name and by his own authority. If the palsy was the temporal punishment of this man's sin, the healing of it alone was the remission of that punishment; and the authoritative language, which offended the Pharisees, was superfluous. But if sin, in every sense, was forgiven to the paralytic, as a true believer, his cure sealed that pardon, and gave him the comfort of it. It also proved the most important point in contest, between Christ and the scribes, namely, that he was the Son of God; and that even as the Son of man, in his deepest humiliation, all judgment was committed to him; and he was authorized to pardon and save any sinner, in the most summary manner, even as he pardoned and saved the thief upon the cross.—'By remitting the sin, ... he manifestly showed who he was: for if none can remit sins but God, and yet our Lord did remit them and cure the man, it is manifest, that he was both the Word of God, and the Son of man, receiving power of remission of sins from his Father, as God and Man.' Irenæus.—'The Jews here say, that it was proper to God to forgive sins; and this Christ denies not; but only proves, that the Son of man had this power also, leaving them to make the inference.' Whithy.

V. 9. (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 2:13—17.) Matthew here gives an account of the manner in which he himself was called to follow Christ. He had also the name of Levi; it being common for men to be known by more names than one. Probably, Matthew was his name when a publican; for he always calls himself by it, and Levi that given him by way of honourable distinction, when he became a follower of Christ; for the other evangelists generally call him so. Thus Saul, when he became an apostle, was named Paul. Matthew was originally a publican, or a collector of the taxes and customs. These were generally farmed out to the best bidder by public sale; and those who hired the revenues of a large district, used to let them out in subdivisions to inferior publicans, who were assisted by the Roman soldiery in collecting them.—The Jews were very averse to the Roman government, out of mistaken principles of conscience, as well as from love to independence: and they deemed it very criminal for their countrymen to follow this employment; so that nothing but the love of gain could induce them to engage in it. In general the publicans from among the Jews were persons of immoral character: and many of them increased the odium against the order, by exacting more than their due, and enforcing their demands by military violence. The office itself therefore rendered men infamous: though they were not all so avaricious and iniquitous, as this opinion of them implies. Matthew was employed in this ensnaring and disgraceful occupation; and was sitting in his office, when Jesus spoke to him. His hands were full of business, perhaps his head of calculations, and his heart of covetousness: for it is not certain, that he had previously paid any regard to the doctrine of Christ. But, when our Lord commanded him to follow him, such a power accompanied the word, as influenced him to renounce immediately his lucrative employment, and to become his constant attendant, that he might be made a preacher of the gospel. So that he arose without delay; and, leaving his business to his partners or assistants, he went after Jesus, and never returned to his former occupation.

V. 10—13. Matthew probably made a final settlement of his affairs; and then made an entertainment, to which he invited Jesus and his disciples, with many publicans, and others of his former acquaintance. (Luke 5:29.) This he seems to have done, in hopes that they too might derive benefit from our Lord's discourse; and accordingly, Christ without hesitation sat down to table with the company. But the Pharisees, who were constantly watching for some objection against him, inquired of his disciples, why their Master acted so inconsistently with his character, as a prophet, as to sit at meat with men of so vile a character: and he justified his conduct by an apt similitude. Persons in health have no occasion for a physician: but the sick are glad of his advice, and willing to follow his prescriptions; and it is his proper business to go among them, though their diseases may render their company unpleasant, or even dangerous. Thus, none but humbled sinners know how to value a Saviour, or profit by his help. Those who are in health do not want a physician. This is not the case with any of our fallen race: but they who suppose their souls to be in health, do not welcome the spiritual Physician; his attendance would be thrown away, and be irksome to them. This was the case of the Pharisees: they despised Christ, because they were whole in their own estimation: but the poor publicans and sinners evidently wanted instruction and amendment; and his compassion led him to go among them, as a Physician, to bring health and cure to their souls. He therefore told the objectors to go and learn the meaning of the passage in their scriptures, which taught them, that God preferred acts of mercy to their brethren, even to the external worship prescribed in the law. (Note, Hos. 6:6.)—Indeed he, the Messiah, did not come into the world, to call the righteous that they might share the privileges of his kingdom: if any were truly righteous of themselves, they could not want his salvation: and they, who proudly thought themselves to be so, would not accept of it. But he came to call sinners to participate the blessings of his kingdom: not by encouraging them in sin: but by exhorting, encouraging, and inducing them to repent, and forsake it.

V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.) John was at this time in prison; and his afflicted circumstances, as well as his mortified character, and the nature of his introductory dispensation, led those who were peculiarly attached to him, and not willing to become Christ's disciples, to observe frequent and strict fasts, as the Pharisees also professed to do: and when they saw Jesus and his followers occasionally go to feasts, (though they seem in general to have lived in a very spare and frugal manner,) they concluded that they never fasted. They therefore inquired of Jesus, why his disciples neglected this part of strict religion, as they supposed it to be: but he, referring them to John's testimony concerning him as "the Bridegroom" of the church, reminded them, that such austerities would be unsuitable to the present circumstances. (Note, John 3:27—36, v. 29.) It would be unseasonable for the companions of a bridegroom to fast, during the days allotted for the nuptials, which were usually spent in festivity: but if any calamity tore him from them, their joy would be turned into mourning, and their feasting into fasting. In like manner, it would be improper for his disciples to fast, whilst they had the comfort of his presence: but he should soon be taken from them, by his crucifixion, and at length by his ascension: and then they would meet with hardships and trials which would render fasting seasonable; nor would they fail to join it with their other religious exercises.

V. 16, 17. Our Lord here referred to some rules of prudence among men. It was not usual to take a piece of woollen cloth, which had never been scoured, or prepared, and to join it to an old garment: because its rough and unpliant sides would not suit the soft old cloth; but would rather tear it further, and make the rent worse. Nor was it usual for men to put new wine into old leathern bottles, which were going to decay; for in this case the bottles would burst, through the fermenting of the wine, and so both be wasted: whereas, by putting the new wine into strong new bottles, both might be preserved. Thus, in those occasional duties, which were not essential to religion, but rather helps to things excellent, discretion should be used, and a proportion observed between the degree of a man's knowledge, experience, and stability, and the self-denial required of him; otherwise they might tend to discouragement, or to fatal mistakes. Hopeful persons might be disheartened, by premature impositions; or led to rest in them and make a self-righteousness of them, and thus become more fatally deluded than ever. So that great caution, prudence, and tenderness were requisite, in dealing with young converts about such matters as, though useful, were not indispensable; that their former habits and sentiments might not be too violently and hastily crossed; and that they might not receive forbidding ideas of the service of their gracious Lord: but opportunities should be waited for, and duties of this kind gradually inculcated as they were able to bear them.

Ruler. (18.) The person who superintended the concerns of the synagogue, and directed the worship there performed. In some places, at least, there were several rulers of the synagogue; but one was chief over the others. Some think that these rulers were also magistrates, and presided over courts of justice in their several cities, which were subordinate to the Sanhedrim, or great council at Jerusalem.—Worshipped.] In the other gospels it is, "Fell down at his feet." (Marg. Ref. o.)—Even now dead.] "She lieth at the point of death." Mark. "She lay a dying." Luke.—The ruler's daughter was not dead when he left her; but he feared that she would die before Jesus could reach his house.

Hem. (20.) Or fringe. Note, Num. 15:38—40.

Faith hath made thee whole, &c. (22) Or, "Thy faith hath saved thee; and the woman was saved," &c. (Σωζησομαι. 21. Σεσωκε σε· σωθη. 22. Luke 7:50. Acts 4:12. 16:30,31.)—The word signifies preservation, or deliverance, from temporal evils or dangers to health, or peace, or eternal happiness, according to the context. The power of Christ was the efficacious cause of the woman's recovery; but her faith, by inducing her to apply to him, secured to her that benefit from, which unbelief excluded many.

Minstrels. (23) 'This custom of instruments at funerals was heathen, and came in but late among the Jews.... The ancient Jewish custom was, that... the lamentation was not begun with musical instruments, but only voices of old women, who, in a sad modulation, strove to extort lamentation from those that were present.' Hammond. (Marg. Ref. d.)

Not dead, &c. (24) 'These words of Christ were plainly spoken to those who were preparing for her interment, and performing the funeral rites belonging to it; and therefore only intimate that she was not so dead as to need their assistance; he being come to awake her, as out of a sleep.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—They laughed him to scorn.] Κατεγελων αυτου. They derided him.

V. 27—29. The displays of the power of Christ were varied, in almost every conceivable way of beneficence; but he wrought no miracles of vengeance; for even the destruction of the swine, merely by his permission, was doubtless intended in mercy, and conducive to much good. All his miracles were likewise emblems of the salutary efficacy of his truth and grace on the souls of men; and nothing is more emphatically descriptive of man's state by nature, than blindness. The mind involved in ignorance or error, through the subtlety of Satan, and the influence of corrupt passions and prejudices, continues impenitent, unbelieving, and unholy; but when the understanding is enlightened, to see things as they really are; the sinner repents, returns to God, and gladly accepts of his salvation.—The prophets had expressly and repeatedly foretold, that the Messiah should open the eyes of the blind; (Marg. Ref. s.) and this is the first instance recorded in which Jesus proved himself to be the Messiah, by fulfilling those prophecies.—It appears from the narrative, that these blind men met him immediately after he came out of the ruler's house: and by accosting him as the "Son of David," they acknowledged him to be the promised Saviour and King of Israel. Thus they showed that they were acquainted with the Scriptures; and it is probable that they rested their hope of recovering sight on the prophecies above mentioned, as well as on the report of the extraordinary miracles which Jesus had already performed. He did not, however, see good publicly to attend to their importunate cries, having already abundantly excited the astonishment of the multitude.—But they, not bearing to be disappointed of a cure, followed him into the house, (probably that of Andrew and Peter,) and there, apart from observation, he drew from them an unwavering confession of their faith in his power to perform the miracle, and then answered their believing expectations and earnest desires.—No one except Jesus ever performed a miracle of this kind. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 30. Our Lord gave this decided and authoritative charge not only to avoid all appearance of ostentation, but also that he might not needlessly excite the opposition of his enemies, or furnish them with plausible accusations against him; and that the people might not be induced to make commotions, as owning him for the Messiah, and desirous of making him a king.

11:33,38.—A vehement commotion of mind is primarily implied by this verb, which is often the commotion of anger, but frequently that of pity, or earnest persuasion and exhortation.—'The word ... is rendered by Phavorinus, ... to charge, to command, to appoint with authority. ... By Hesychius, to command, or charge with a threat. ... It is a rational earnestness and vehemence, not a passionate.' Hammond. (Note, Mark 1:40—44.)

V. 31. The joy, gratitude, and amazement of the men who had recovered their sight rendered them incapable of refraining themselves, and regardless of the injunction given them. Their motives and purpose were doubtless good; yet their conduct cannot be justified.

V. 32, 33. It seems this man was dumb, not from any natural defect, but by the power of an evil spirit; and that this was generally allowed to be the case. When the evil spirit was cast out, he was immediately capable of speaking; and the spectators of these multiplied and stupendous miracles were so astonished, that they declared the like had never been seen even in Israel, where prophets had often wrought many and great miracles in confirmation of their testimony.—'This reflection was perfectly just; for no one of the prophets, that we read of in the Old Testament, appears to have wrought so many beneficent miracles, in his whole life, as our Lord did in this one afternoon.' Doddridge.—Perhaps this may admit of some doubt, or exception; but the remark is well worthy of attention. It is not recorded, that either prophet or apostle, in any one instance, enabled the dumb to speak. It was expressly predicted that the Messiah would do this; and it was therefore performed by Jesus only; as exclusively and directly marking him out to be the Messiah. (Note, Is. 35:5—7.)

V. 34. The Pharisees, not able to deny the reality or the greatness of the miracle, and fearing, not without cause, lest the people should thence conclude that Jesus was the Messiah; declared that it was not wrought by a divine power, but by that of the prince of the devils; for, Jesus being in league with that arch apostate, whom all the other fallen angels obeyed as their leader, availed himself of this authority, in casting out evil spirits, that he might give a sanction to his false doctrine.—What answer Christ at this time made to this most malignant charge we know not; but on another occasion he very fully confuted and exposed it. (Notes, 12:22—37.)

V. 35. Synagogues.] The temple was the centre of the worship appointed for Israel by the law, and no sacrifices might be offered elsewhere; but in process of time, it was found necessary to have other places set apart for public prayer and instruction. For these purposes synagogues were built, and after the captivity, they became general in all the cities and villages; and probably they were proportionably more numerous than churches and chapels are with us. Learned men think, that forms of worship were statedly used, on certain days in the week, as well as on the sabbath-days; and the Scriptures, divided into portions, were constantly read in them: so that they were very useful in keeping the people from idolatry. The Levites and scribes might commonly officiate in them, but this service was not restricted to them; they had stated rulers and officers, but no regular pastors or teachers; so that competent persons occasionally gave exhortations, as they were disposed or desired to do it; and the case was the same in other nations, where the Jews resided. Christ therefore went round the country teaching in the synagogues, and no one attempted to interrupt or hinder him.—'It was the manner among the Jews for divers men to contribute their talents to the exposition of the lesson which was read. ... This ordinarily belonged to the sons of the prophets, who were brought up in learning the law; and at thirty years old might be made doctors; and they continued under that name, or the other of scribes, till they obtained the spirit of prophecy. In proportion to which was the difference in the Christian church betwixt the evangelist, and the doctor, or teacher; the first telling them good news, and planting the gospel; the other watering, or instructing them further in it.' Hammond.—It is, however, plain that others, besides scribes or doctors, were allowed and invited to expound the Scriptures, and give exhortations in the synagogues. (Marg. Ref.) And the gospel was generally planted by the apostles, and apostolical men; not by inferior ministers.

Synagogues.] Συναγωγαι. (Ex συν, et αγω, to gather together.) The word was first used by the LXX for the congregation or the company assembled. (Ex. 12:6,19,47.) But at length it was appropriated to the place of convention. Thus εκκλησια, a word of similar import, first and more properly meant the assembled company; but gradually became the word used for the building in which it assembled.

V. 36—38. Great multitudes resorted from distant places to hear our Lord's instructions: and they appeared not only languishing in soul, for want of better teaching than they had hitherto received; but also ready to faint with hunger and fatigue, by continuing long at a distance from their habitations. In both senses, they were scattered "as sheep having no shepherd." There were many priests, Levites, and scribes, all over the land; but they were idol-shepherds: (Note, Zech. 11:15—17.) and Christ had compassion on the people, as "perishing for lack of knowledge." In the prospect, therefore, of the vast multitudes which would in a short time, both from Jews and Gentiles, be gathered into the church, he declared that a plenteous harvest was growing in the field, which would require many active and industrious labourers to reap it; but there were very few who deserved that character It was, therefore, at that time especially, the duty of the disciples, to pray most earnestly to the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers, that is, able, faithful, diligent, and effective ministers, into the harvest.—Christ himself is "the Lord of the harvest," and in the next chapter we read that he sent forth labourers: but it is probable that the disciples did not understand him to speak of himself on this occasion.—The expression translated, "send forth," literally signifies, "thrust forth," and implies the powerful impulse of God upon the heart, which would be necessary to overcome the diffidence and reluctance of humble and able men, to enter on that important work, especially when it would expose them to many perils and hardships. 'Word for word, cast them out; for men are very slow in so holy a work.' Beza.—'From this discourse ... we learn these things, worthy to be regarded by all the pastors of Christ's flock. (1.) That he who doth not instruct his flock in "the sincere milk of the word," and acquaint them with the things belonging to their eternal peace, from a heart full of love to God, and to the souls committed to his charge, deserves not the name of a true shepherd: for the want of these things, in the scribes and Pharisees, made Christ complain, that the Jews were "as sheep without a shepherd." (2.) That when the harvest is great, and there be many ... ready to receive instruction, we should be the more diligent and laborious to afford it them. (3.) That in such cases, when either we are not called to the work, or are placed in another station, we should pray fervently, that God would raise up men, fitted for their instruction, and zealous for his glory and the good of souls.' Whitby.—This last remark is peculiarly applicable to the present times, and the efforts made in order to evangelize the heathen. (See a Sermon, preached before the Missionary Society in 1804, on this text, by the Author.]

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Our gracious Lord will not continue his presence or ordinances with those who despise them and are weary of them; for in every place he finds abundant opportunities of showing mercy. They who feel themselves miserable through sin and its effects, and who believe that he, and he only, can deliver them, will submit to any inconveniences in applying to him: and as they are glad of direction and assistance from their stronger brethren, these should be ready to help them, according to their ability and opportunity.—Christ can see faith in the heart; yet he loves to point it out in those effects, by which it becomes manifest to us also: and when the most sinful and afflicted of the human race earnestly press through difficulties, that they may seek his salvation, they should be "of good cheer;" for he addresses them as his children, and forgives their sins.—It would be far better to have a pardon, and to be left to languish under incurable disease, till death release us; than to be cured of our sickness, and left under the guilt and power of our sins, to "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath:" yet, if the sin be forgiven, deliverance from pain and sorrow will in due time follow, and consolation in the mean while be afforded us. Even Jesus could not do good so unexceptionably, but that proud scribes would censure him, and even accuse him of blasphemy; let us then never expect to escape calumny, or be deterred from duty by the fear of it. The Lord, who knows men's hearts, often hears them say such things within themselves, concerning him and his gospel, and service, as they would be afraid or ashamed to avow: but he will as certainly call them to a strict account for their evil surmises, as for their wicked words and works.—When at Christ's command, the paralytic arose, and carried home that bed on which he had been brought in a helpless condition; the authority of Christ to pardon, and the man's forgiveness, were at once demonstrated: and when sinners are enabled, at his word, to renounce customary iniquities, and to delight in obeying God's commandments, they too may know that their crimes are all blotted out. Thus men come to Christ, burdened and enslaved by their sins; but when he heals them, and enables them to walk at liberty in newness of life, all who witness and love the surprising change, are led to adore his power and grace, and to glorify God on their account. But as Jesus, in his humiliation, had power on earth to forgive sins, (which was an act of divine authority,) so, now that he reigns in glory, his mediatorial commission reaches no further; and they who leave the earth unpardoned, must sink into condemnation for ever.

V. 9—17. Many eminent servants of God have been called, not only from low occupations, but from scenes of gross iniquity. The word of Christ appears as powerful, in overcoming avarice or pride, as in rebuking the winds and waves, or in casting out legions of devils. Those who have experienced the power of his grace, will compassionate their former companions in sin, and devise means, and willingly incur expense, to bring them into the way of instruction. We must not associate with ungodly men, out of love to their vain conversation, but we may from good will to their souls. We should, however, remember that our good Physician had the power of healing inherent in him, and was in no danger of taking infection; but it is not so with us: we should therefore consider our own constitution, so to speak; and not needlessly go into unwholesome air, lest in attempting to do good to others, we get injury to ourselves. Let us rather inquire, whether we have discovered our sickness, and have learned to value our Physician, and to follow his directions. For there are yet many stout-hearted Pharisees, who are whole in their own estimation, and are more disposed to carp at his words and works, than to wait on him for the healing of their souls. But if we be humbled sinners, and desire his salvation, let us remember that he delights in mercy, and that he "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance:" and let us learn to copy his mercy, and use all proper means, to bring even the vilest of sinners to repentance, and faith in the Saviour.—How prone is the human heart to self-preference and censoriousness! Let us beware of this leaven which corrupts those things which are good in themselves, and turns even an act of devotion into an abomination. Whilst therefore we judge for ourselves, as in the sight of God, at what seasons the presence and consolations of the heavenly Bridegroom call us to thankful joy and praise, and when his absence, through our sins or for our humiliation, requires us to join fasting with our confessions and supplications; let us not presume to judge or prescribe to others, or prefer ourselves to them on such accounts. There are indeed matters in religion so indispensable, that sinners must be urged to them, without delay or reserve: but there are others, which in due time and manner may be inculcated; but which hopeful persons cannot receive at present, and which are not needful, and might prove injurious to them. And much mischief has been done, both in respect of doctrines, external observances, and austerities, by "putting new wine into old bottles;" but "wisdom is profitable to direct," and should be sought from God.

V. 18—26. Rulers and superior persons are sometimes brought to Christ, by those afflictions, which admit of no remedy, from their secular distinctions and possessions: and when the greatest feel their need of him, and know his power and dignity, they will abase themselves as much before him, as the meanest. Even amiable and dutiful children are often the source of much care and sorrow to their parents: but the best remedy, in respect both of their lives and souls, is to apply to Christ in their behalf; as life and death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, are entirely at his disposal.—How various are the distresses and humiliating diseases, to which sin has subjected our species! And in how many ways does true faith operate, amidst the fears, diffidence, shame, remaining ignorance, and infirmity, of those that are made partakers of it! Yet if we do but touch, as it were, the hem of Christ's garment by living faith, our most inveterate maladies will be healed; but there is no other remedy: and we need not fear his knowing those things concerning us, which are our grief and burden, and which we should not wish to disclose to any earthly friend. We must not, however, desire to conceal our obligations to his power and grace: our comfort and his glory are concerned, in their being made known; and when he sees the humble believer ready to sink with shame and terror, he will, by some encouraging token, show his acceptance and special love. But he often delays to bring intended relief, till things come to an extremity: thus he proves our faith and patience, and renders the mercy doubly welcome, and our gratitude and admiration more abundant. They, who treat his words with contempt, and expect nothing from his power, are not meet persons to witness his glory.—Even death, to those whom he loves, is only a sleep. they will shortly awake at his word; and as our deceased Christian friends will share with us this joyful resurrection, we should not "sorrow as men without hope," though we expect not their return to us in this world. And if this single instance, of Christ's raising one that was newly dead, so increased his fame; what will be his glory, when "all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and come forth, they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation!"

V. 27—38. Still we are astonished with the lustre of the Redeemer's power and love. Let sinners then copy the example of these blind men: let them stand before the Son of David, though they cannot behold him; and let them beseech him to have mercy upon them, and open their eyes to see his glory and preciousness, his truth and will: let them persist in following him with their entreaties, and in due time he will notice and help them. In this and in every other respect, we need to cry unto him daily to "increase our faith;" that we may believe assuredly, that he is both able and willing to do every thing for us, which pertains to our salvation. If faith be not wanting in us, love and power will not be wanting in him: but he will say, "According to your faith be it unto you:" and instead of being deprived of so great a pleasure, we shall be sent forth to proclaim "his praises, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light."—While sinners remain under the power of Satan, they are deprived of the best use of the gift of speech, and cannot speak to any good purpose; but when Christ delivers them, their "mouths are opened to show forth his praise." We should therefore bring those to him, who are not willing to come of themselves; and entreat him for those, whom Satan so possesses, that they will not pray for themselves.—But nothing can convince those who indulge pride and malice, that the humbling doctrines of Scripture are the truths of God: they will believe any absurdity rather than the divinely authenticated Scriptures; and the injurious reflections which they cast on those who are diligently employed in doing good to their fellow-creatures, show the enmity of their hearts against a holy God. We should therefore go on in our work, without regarding them: and, as to this day vast multitudes are "as sheep not having a shepherd," we should compassionate them, and do all that we can to help them. The harvest that is yet to be reaped, (and ere long, according to the prophecies,) is very plentiful; the real labourers are, alas! extremely few: we should therefore pray earnestly and constantly to the Lord of the harvest, to raise up and send forth many, who will "labour in the word and doctrine," and in bringing souls to Christ; instead of labouring to advance, enrich, and indulge themselves. This is a duty too much neglected: but when God shall stir up the hearts of Christians every where to attend to it, we may expect the dawning of those happy days, when the gospel shall be known and believed all over the earth.

that the apostles had been called to a constant attendance on Christ, a considerable time before, as persons intended for some important service. (Notes, Mark 3:13—19. 6:7—12.) At length they were solemnly appointed, and endued by their Lord with the power of casting out unclean spirits, and healing diseases in his name, to confirm their doctrine; and sent forth, by two and two, into different parts of the land, to prepare the people to receive him. The word "apostle" signifies a messenger, and as such it is given to Christ himself. (Heb. 3:1.) They were his messengers, sent forth to proclaim his kingdom; and after his resurrection, they were especially selected to bear witness of that event. They were twelve in number, probably with reference to the twelve tribes of Israel. A catalogue of their names is here given, in which some things require consideration. Simon is first mentioned, both in this and other places: his original name signifies hearing. But our Lord, when Simon first came to him, named him Cephas, or Peter, from the word which signifies a rock, or a stone; denoting that he would prove a firm and steadfast man, and stable in professing and supporting the truth of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, John 1:35—42.) He is first mentioned, not as having authority over the other apostles, which some vainly pretend: but because he was the elder of the first two brothers, who were called to a constant attendance on Christ; and because his abilities, zeal, and disposition, combined in rendering him a principal and conspicuous character among them. His brother Andrew was sent out along with him. James, whom Herod slew, (Note, Acts 12:1—4.) and John the Evangelist, his brother, were sent forth together; they were the two next who were called to follow Christ. Philip and Bartholomew, of whom we know less, were put together. Thomas, who is commonly called Didymus, or the Twin, was joined with Matthew the converted publican. James, the son of Alpheus, who wrote the Epistle, was joined with Lebbeus, or Thaddeus, the same person who is elsewhere called Jude, or Judas: the names here given him are supposed to signify hearty or cordial, to distinguish him from the other Judas, who was a hypocrite. (Note, Mark 3:13—19.) The latter was joined with Simon the Canaanite, or the man of Cana, as some explain it; though others suppose the word to be equivalent to Zelotes, or the zealous, by which he is elsewhere distinguished. (Acts 1:13.) The other Judas is always called Iscariot, which is generally supposed to mean "the man of Charioth:" yet some think, that it is derived from a word signifying suspension, and refers to the manner of his death. He professed himself Christ's disciple, and his apparent conduct did not contradict that profession: the Lord was therefore pleased to call him to be his constant attendant, and at length to make him one of his apostles, though he knew his hypocrisy; and thus the Scripture might be fulfilled by his treachery and apostacy; for he "also," or even, "betrayed him."—Some think that Bartholomew was the same, as St. John calls Nathaniel. (Marg. Ref. h.)—Our Lord's "giving power" to his apostles, and enabling them to work miracles, and, after his resurrection and the descent of the Holy Spirit, communicating the same powers to those on whom they laid their hands, was justly considered by the ancient fathers, as a striking proof of his Deity; and as absolutely unparalleled in the history of mankind, true or fabulous, sacred or profane. God put of his Spirit on those whom Moses had appointed: but Moses did not give them power. The spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha, in answer to Elijah's prayer; but Elijah did not give him power. (Notes, Num. 11:16,17,25. 2 Kings 2:9—11.)

V. 5, 6. When Christ sent forth the apostles, he gave them a charge, or special warnings and instructions, many of which had reference to the whole of their future ministry. In these he forbade them, at that time, to go among the Gentiles, or to any place which bordered on them, or into any city of the Samaritans. He had indeed once preached, with great success, in a city of Samaria; (John 4:28—42.) yet his personal ministry, and that of his apostles before his ascension, were chiefly confined to the Jews; that they might not be prejudiced by a contrary conduct, or have any pretence for rejecting the gospel: for the change intended was to be effected gradually, and the obstinate unbelief of the Jews would make way for the calling of the Gentiles. The apostles therefore were commanded to "go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." The term "lost sheep," intimated, that the Israelites, though by profession the flock of God, had in general wandered from him, were destitute of faithful shepherds, and in danger of perishing; even as the Samaritans and Gentiles were. (Marg. Ref. Note, 9:36—38.)

V. 7, 8. (Note, 3:2.) The apostles were ordered in every place to preach, or proclaim as heralds, in the most earnest and public manner, the same grand doctrine which John the Baptist had done, and which Christ himself began with preaching: for their ministry was, at this time, introductory to the open establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. In confirmation of their mission, they were empowered to work miracles and even to raise the dead. This latter clause indeed is wanting in some manuscripts, but it is found in the earliest. Yet it is not recorded, that the apostles raised any dead persons before the descent of the Holy Spirit; and probably they did not; but the charge, at this time given, evidently referred to the subsequent, as well as to the introductory part of their ministry. They were especially and expressly prohibited to make any personal advantage of these miraculous powers, as if they would sell the gift of God for money; (Note, Acts 8:18—24.) but must confer the benefit freely, as they had received it.—They who urge this text against the preachers of the gospel receiving a maintenance for their labour, evidently pervert it, and set it against the plainest declarations of the New Testament. It is, however, greatly to be desired, that a more decided superiority to "the love of filthy lucre" were generally observable among the ministers of Christianity.—Doubtless Judas preached and wrought miracles, as well as the other apostles: and, probably for his credit's sake, he resisted the temptation of making any gain of his miraculous powers; at least he was not suspected by the other apostles. (Note, 7:21—23.)

Freely. (8) Δωρεαν. John 15:25. Rom. 3:24. 2 Cor. 11:7. Gal. 2:21. 2 Thes. 3:8. Rev. 21:6. 22:17.—Gen. 29:15. Is. 52:3. Sept. 'This particle, in the sacred books, is used in a twofold sense, namely, both of a benefit conferred of mere liberality; and of an injury inflicted by iniquity, on one that does not deserve it, either for no cause, or for no just cause.' Leigh.

V. 9, 10. The command "freely to give," and the prohibition to "provide," or possess, money to bear expenses, should be compared together. The apostles (and doubtless all other ministers,) were required to be eminently disinterested; yet they must trust God for support, even in those places where they were strangers. They were not allowed to carry with them either money, or provisions, in a scrip or bag; or clothes, or shoes; or a superfluous staff, in case any thing should happen to that with which they walked: for the Lord engaged to provide for their wants, by disposing those, to whom they went, to supply them. This they might conscientiously take, as the labourer is worthy of his maintenance; and more they must not covet.—The word rendered "purses," signifies girdles: it was customary for travellers to carry money for ordinary occasions, in a pocket, or fold, within their girdles.—'The ministers of the word must cast away all cares that might hinder them the least.'—"Provide neither gold, &c." That is 'for this journey, . . . that they might feel some taste of God's providence; for at their return, the Lord asked them, whether they lacked any thing by the way. Luke 22:35.' Beza.—"He is worthy of his food;" not of dainties; for it becomes not a teacher to fare deliciously.' Theophylact. (Note, 1 Tim. 5:17,18.)

V. 11—15. The apostles were directed to inquire, when they arrived at any city or town, what persons resided there, of good repute for piety and integrity; and to address them with the first proposal of the gospel: and, in case they received and entertained them, they must abide with them, if convenient, till they left the place: that they might not appear to be capricious, dissatisfied with their accommodation, or desirous of going from house to house, to partake of entertainments.

15 [l]Verily I say unto you, [m]It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah, [n]in the day of judgment, than for that city.

[Practical Observations.]

16 ¶ Behold, I send you forth [o]as sheep in the midst of wolves: be ye therefore [p]wise as serpents, [q]and [r]harmless as doves.

17 But [r]beware of men; [s]for they will deliver you up to the [t]councils, and they will [u]scourge you in their synagogues;

18 And ye shall [x]be brought before governors and kings for my sake, [y]for a testimony against them and the Gentiles.

19 But [z]when they deliver you up, [a]take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for [b]it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak.

20 For it is not ye that speak, [c]but the Spirit of [d]your Father which speaketh in you.

21 And [e]the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and [f]the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death.

22 And ye [g]shall be hated of all men [h]for my name's sake; [i]but he that endureth to the end shall be saved.

23 But [k]when they persecute you in this city, flee ye into another: for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not [l]have gone over the cities of Israel, [l]till the Son of man be come.

When they entered any house, they must salute those who resided in it, in the customary manner, wishing that the peace and blessing of God might be communicated to them, and proposing the gospel of peace and salvation. And if the family, or any in it, were pious persons, disposed to welcome the gospel, the blessing would rest on them, and the messengers of Christ would further instruct and pray for them: but where this was not the case, the prayers and endeavours of the apostles would return in blessings on themselves.—It is generally said, that the imperative mood is here used instead of the future tense; but it seems also to imply a direction to ministers how to act in such cases.—When, however, their gracious proposal met with an obstinate rejection, on leaving the place they must "shake off the dust of their feet." (Marg. Ref. k.) It is recorded that the Jews, on returning from heathen countries, thus shook off the dust that clave to them; as afraid of bringing any pollution into the holy land, and as renouncing all connexion with idolaters; so that the conduct of the apostles in this respect, would be understood to be a decided protestation against the conduct of the persons concerned; and a declaration, that they considered them equally criminal and exposed to divine wrath, with the Gentiles themselves.—To this injunction our Lord added, in the most solemn manner conceivable, that it would be more tolerable even for the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the day of judgment, than for those of such a city. Their obstinate impenitence and unbelief, amid such abundant opportunities of instruction and conviction, would evince a more determined enmity against God, than was manifested by all the gross abominations of Sodom, for which it had been visited with tremendous vengeance: and though they might escape punishment in this world, yet "in the day of judgment" and final retribution, their doom would be more intolerable. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16—18. Our Lord next taught the apostles to prepare for persecution. He sent them forth as harmless, defenceless sheep, into the midst of rapacious and cruel wolves, who would neither want will nor power to devour them, except as they were divinely protected. It would therefore behoove them to unite the caution and sagacity, of which serpents have ever been the emblem, with the simple, inoffensive, pure, and loving temper of the dove: that they might avoid every thing which could needlessly exasperate, or give an advantage to their enemies; all intermeddling with secular matters not belonging to them; and all rashness, violence, appearance of evil, or selfishness.—'This is to be wise as serpents; ... to be circumspect in declining their snares, and giving them no just occasion to afflict us; and to be harmless as doves, is to offend no man by word or example; and so to give them no cause to do evil unto us.' Theophylact.—Circumstanced as the apostles would be, their most determined courage and patience ought to be tempered with prudence; nor must they be rendered unsuspecting, even by the consciousness of integrity and benevolence. On the contrary, they ought to "beware of men," as of enemies more implacable and fierce than wolves or tigers, and also most treacherous and insidious. No dependence therefore must be placed on their engagements; no regard paid to their flatteries, or professions of respect and friendship; no expectations formed of any thing, but injurious treatment of every kind and from all quarters.—It was needful therefore that the apostles should count their cost, and prepare to face danger and endure affliction. For they would certainly be apprehended, and delivered up, as criminals, to the public councils of the nation, and condemned to be scourged in the synagogues, where their consistories about ecclesiastical affairs were held; nay, they would at length be brought before the Roman governors, and the kings of the nations, for their attachment to the name and cause of Christ. Thus they would have an opportunity of declaring his gospel in their hearing, which, being neglected, would turn to a "testimony against them.

Harmless. (16) Ακεραιοι. Rom. 16:19. Phil. 2:15. Some derive the word from a priv. and κερας a horn: but this derivation is not satisfactory to the best Greek scholars; and indeed animals without horns, as lions and tigers, are by no means the most innoxious. It seems to be derived from a priv. and κεραω to mix, and to mean simple, sincere, candid, without guile, and without malignity.—A testimony against them. (18) Μαρτυριον αυτοις.—A testimony unto them.

V. 19, 20. The apostles were unlearned men, brought up in obscurity, and not used to speak before public assemblies of earthly potentates: they might therefore fear lest they should dishonour the cause, by impropriety of conduct and language. But they had no need to be solicitous on that account; for, as they were not called to plead their own cause, but that of their Lord, he would immediately suggest to them what they should speak: and thus their answers would not so much be their own thoughts or words, as those of the Holy Spirit of their heavenly Father, speaking by them. (Marg. Ref. c.) —The case here supposed was extraordinary; and neither the direction nor the promise is applicable to ordinary cases. Yet every minister and Christian is authorized to expect assistance adequate to the occasion, whatever it be.—Take no thought. (19) Μη μεριμνησητε. See on Note, 6:25.

V. 21, 22. The apostles might imagine, that their harmless, holy, and prudent conduct, their beneficent miracles, and the glad tidings of the Messiah's advent, would conciliate the favour of great numbers. But Christ assured them, that they would, on the contrary, experience the most rancorous enmity even from near relations: for the gospel, being contrary to the prejudices, pride, and lusts of men; interfering with their worldly interests and projects; and opposed by those evil spirits, which "work in the children of disobedience;" would certainly occasion vehement convulsions in cities and nations, and excite the jealousy of rulers; it would throw men into different parties, and produce violent controversies, and at length furious persecutions. Then the enemies of the truth would forget the ties of consanguinity and affinity; brethren would apprehend and accuse one another, and procure each other's death; parents, regardless of natural affection, would prosecute their own children to death; and even children, in violation of all their duties and obligations, would rise up against their own parents to procure their execution: nay, the preachers and professors of Christianity would be hated by men of all nations, sects, and characters, for the sake of Christ; yea, by all men, except those who were won over to embrace the gospel. This would expose them to such dangers and sufferings, as would violently tempt them to apostatize. But those who continued to cleave to the Lord, and held out to the end, would be preserved from all real damage, and recompensed with everlasting felicity; whilst apostates would be finally ruined and lost. (Marg. Ref.)

Cause to be put to death. (21) Θανατωσουσι. Rom. 8:13.—'Kill them.' For the iniquitous prosecutor in a capital cause is the real murderer.

He that endureth. (22) Ὁ υπομεινας. See on Note, Heb. 12:2,3, v. 3.—Note, Jam. 1:12. The word implies not only suffering, but being tried, and standing the trial, as gold does the fire. This trial hypocrites cannot endure, but true believers do. Judas did not "endure unto the end," but the other apostles did. 'He that endureth to the end of these days of persecution from the unbelieving Jews, shall be saved from the dreadful destruction coming on them.' Whitby. This may perhaps be implied; but surely, endurance to the end of life, and everlasting salvation, are principally intended.

V. 23. The open manner in which Christ warned his apostles concerning the persecutions which awaited them, emphatically evinced a consciousness of authority, and of influence over their hearts, and of power to support and recompense them.—They must in nowise conceal or palliate their message, in order to avoid persecution: yet they ought not rashly to expose themselves, or to rush into danger; but when persecuted in one city, to flee to another, and there preach the gospel. This would often drive them from apparent scenes of usefulness; yet it would prove no injury to the common cause, for they would not have gone over all "the cities of Israel, till the Son of Man should come."—'This phrase . . . signifies, either his coming with the Roman army to destroy the Jews; . . . or else his coming to the final judgment: and seeing the apostles were none of them to live till the final judgment, it seems necessary to understand this of his coming to avenge his quarrel on the Jewish nation.' Whitby.—The apostles met with no persecutions till after the day of Pentecost; so that subsequent events must be intended, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans seems especially pointed out.—Persecution prevented the apostles from preaching the gospel throughout the whole land, so fully as they might otherwise have done. The conversion of the Gentiles, after a time, found many of them other employment: and when the judgments of God on the Jews took place, several cities of Israel had not been visited, or statedly instructed, by the preachers of the gospel.

V. 24—26. The disciple is not generally regarded as a person of greater dignity or excellency than his teacher, or the servant than his master; nor ought he to expect greater respect and deference; but never were disciples or servants so inferior to their Lord and Master, as Christ's were. If then they met with injurious usage and opprobrious language, in the course of their ministry, they should remember, that the great Master of the family, notwithstanding his divine excellency, wisdom, holiness, and beneficence, had been called Beelzebub, as if he were "the prince of the devils," or in league with him: and it ought to satisfy them, his domestics, to be as their Lord, and treated in the same manner; considering their immense inferiority and great unworthiness. They were, therefore, exhorted not to fear those, who might load them with reproachful names or false accusations, or charge them with base motives or designs: for a time would soon come, when all secrets would be disclosed; and then their characters, principles, motives, and intentions would be made known, and fully justified; and the malignity and wickedness of their accusers detected and put to shame.—'These words (26) are capable of two good senses. Let not the dread of these persecutors affright you from preaching . . . the gospel, as despairing of success: for though at present it seems to be hidden from the world, and it is like to be obscured a while by the calumnies of the Jews and others: I will cause it to shine through all the world, and dissipate all the clouds they cast over it, and break through all obstacles, and will render it mighty to "cast down every high thought, &c." (2 Cor. 10:5.) Or thus: Fear not the calumnies, with which they shall load you; . . . for I will make the innocency and excellency of your doctrine as clear as the light; and your integrity, in the dispensing of it, and your patience in suffering for it, to redound to your praise, . . . throughout all ages, and especially at the revelation of the Lord from heaven.' Whitby.

(Ab οικος.) Domestic servants especially, as distinguished from servants employed in the field, or at a distance.

V. 27, 28. The apostles could not be cut off, till they had finished their testimony; they ought therefore to be very bold and zealous in declaring, in the most public manner, those truths which Christ had taught them privately, as by a whisper in their ears: and even to proclaim them from the tops of the houses; according to the usage of the Jews concerning those things which they desired to make known to all the neighbourhood. This indeed would expose them to much enmity, and even endanger their lives; but if their persecutors should be permitted to proceed as far as possible, they could only kill the mortal body, a little before the time, when it would otherwise die of disease or natural decay: for they could by no means destroy the immortal soul, either by terminating its existence, or preventing its immediate and final felicity. The tortures, which might thus be endured, would indeed be dreadful to nature; yet they would not be comparable to the misery which God was able to inflict, in the destruction of both body and soul in hell. The apostles and other servan of Christ ought not, therefore, to fear the impotent malice of man, but the omnipotent, everlasting, and righteous indignation of God; which they would certainly incur, if they apostatized for fear of persecution, or failed to fulfil their important ministry.—'These words . . . contain a certain evidence, that the soul dies not with the body, but continues afterwards in a state of sensibility. . . . That which . . . men can do to the body, . . . they cannot do to the soul. . . . They who, by killing the body, make the soul also to perish, till the reunion and revivescence both of body and soul, do also kill the soul: . . . and they who by killing the body, render the soul . . . insensate, . . . do also kill the soul. For it is not easy to conceive, how a . . . thinking and perceiving being can be more killed, than by depriving it of all sensation, thought, and perception; the body itself being killed, by a total privation of . . . sense and motion. . . . It remains, that the soul doth not perish with the body, nor is it reduced into an insensible state by the death of it.' Whitby.—The language also strongly exposes the impotent rage of those, who by brutal treatment of the insensate body, try to do more, than merely to kill the object of their hatred: for this after all does nothing: nor ought any thing of this kind to give the least uneasiness to the mind of any one.

V. 29—31. The apostles might expect, that their enemies would at length kill their bodies; but even this could not possibly be effected, without the permission of their almighty Father. His providence watched over all creatures, even the meanest of them. Sparrows, for instance, were so inconsiderable, that two were usually sold for a farthing: yet not one of them could fall to the ground and die, either by a natural or violent death, except by his immediate interposition. Even the very hairs of his people were all numbered and registered: every thing was deemed important that related to them, and especially to those who were employed to spread his gospel. In every way, the apostles, and the other servants of God, were unspeakably more valuable than many sparrows: it could not therefore be supposed, that their Father and Friend would permit any enemy to do them real harm. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 32, 33. For the further encouragement of the apostles, and of others in every age who should be exposed to persecution for Christ's sake; he declared, that every one who boldly acknowledged him, and professed his truth in the face of danger and opposition, without turning aside from fear or shame, shall be abundantly recompensed: for he would confess and own him as a disciple, a friend, a brother, in the presence of his Father; especially in the day of judgment and final separation between his people and his enemies. But, on the other hand, whosoever shall be induced by worldly motives to deny or disown Christ, or renounce his service, would, at that most awful crisis, be denied by him before his Father, and left to perish with his enemies; notwithstanding his former profession, gifts, or station in the church.—Ever denial of Christ cannot be here intended; for Peter denied him, yet repented and was pardoned: that only can be meant, which is persisted in. In like manner, every confession of Christ cannot be entitled to the blessed recompense here promised; but that only which is the genuine and constant language of faith and love. (Marg. Ref.) The majesty and conscious dignity and authority of this declaration, made by a poor and despised Man, "who had not where to lay his head;" conveys such a testimony of his Deity, as cannot be answered, in any way consistent with allowing the excellency of his character

V. 34—36. The gospel, beyond doubt, in its genuine tendency, is suited to reconcile men to God and to each other; and if all men were consistent Christians, peace must be universal. But "the world lieth in wickedness," and under the wicked one: Christians must profess the truth, in opposition to all error; and obey their Lord, in opposition to all the maxims, customs, fashions, and vices of the world: and the end of Christ's coming was to set up a heavenly kingdom in the midst of Satan's empire, and built upon its ruins. Where no true religion is found, men may avoid theological disputes, whatever else they quarrel about, for they are essentially of one party, and their notions and observances admit of what some have called an intercommunity: but where the standard of the cross is erected, and sinners enlist under the Redeemer's banner; they are no longer "of the world," but of another kingdom, the laws, maxims, motives, and interests of which, are diametrically opposite to those of "the god" and "prince of this world." This must offend Satan and his servants; and the most harmless disciples, and ministers of Christ, will in consequence be reproached, calumniated, opposed, and persecuted: and when the enemy can excite the princes of this world to oppose the gospel, the sword of religious wars, of massacres, and of persecution, will be sent forth. Thus the wolves devour the inoffensive sheep, and then throw the blame on them as the authors of the quarrel!—Whenever men called Christians have persecuted others, it must have arisen from their not being real Christians, or from their not understanding the religion which they professed: for patient, meek endurance of persecution, and courageous profession and obedience in the midst of it, are the characteristics of true Christianity. In the present state of human nature, however, it must be expected, and our Lord foretold, that the gospel would give occasion to furious and bloody conflicts; so that even families would be divided into parties, and men would treat their nearest relatives as their worst enemies: and this has in fact been the case, in every nation, city, town, or village, where the true gospel of Christ has been successfully preached. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—It has been shown, that instead of the happy and prosperous days, which the Jews expected when the Messiah came; the most fierce and bloody contests, which ever embroiled that or perhaps any other nation, followed his coming, till judgment came upon them to the uttermost. But this was no otherwise the consequence of his coming, than as their rejection of Christ provoked God to give them up to judicial infatuation; for they did not in the least quarrel about Christianity: this cannot therefore be considered, as the true interpretation of these verses.—The passage refers to the prophecy of Micah: (7:6.) but cannot be looked upon as a quotation. (Notes, 21, 22. Gen. 3:14,15. Luke 12:49—53.)

To set at variance. (35) Διχασαι· (a διχα, divisim: into two parts:) to divide into two parts or parties. Used here only in N. T.

V. 37—39. When matters should come to such extremities, that a man must lose the comfort and favour of his nearest relations, and incur their enmity, unless he renounced or disobeyed Christ; he, who was found to love father or mother, son or daughter, more than Christ, would be deemed unworthy of the privileges of his kingdom. Nay, he that refused to carry his cross, (as malefactors used to do, when they were led to be crucified,) and to suffer death rather than renounce Christ and the gospel, would be judged unworthy to be called a disciple of such a master; seeing he would not follow his example of patient suffering, for the cause of God and truth. He therefore, who thus saved his life from imminent peril, whilst he thought himself a gainer by finding the life of his body, would lose all the true comfort and usefulness even of this life, and also the life of his precious soul: but he that lost his temporal life for Christ's sake, would find it amply made up to him by everlasting life in heaven. (Notes, 16:24—28. Mark 8:32 - 37. Luke 9:18—27.)—It is manifest that in these verses our Lord claims, and demands from all his disciples, that supreme and entire love, with which the law requires us to love the LORD our God. This he never would have done, had he not been "One with the Father;" and had not our love of him, as Emmanuel, been the proper evidence and effect of our returning, by repentance and faith, to that love of God with the whole heart and soul, from which we as sinners have departed.—No mere creature could have made such a claim, without becoming the rival of God, who "will not give his glory to another;" but "he," and he only, "that honoureth the Son, honoureth the Father that sent him."

V. 40—42. Christ here concludes this most solemn and interesting address, by assuring the apostles, that he should consider himself immediately concerned in the reception which was given to them: insomuch that those who should entertain them, out of love to their message and a disposition to obey it, would be recompensed in the same manner as if they had welcomed Christ himself to their houses and to their hearts; and they who thus received him as their Saviour, in fact received the Father himself to be their God and Portion.—Indeed, at any time, he that should entertain a prophet, or a holy messenger of God, as such, and for the sake of him that sent him, would be recompensed, in answer to the benedictions and prayers of the prophet, with a reward fit to be conferred even upon the prophet himself: and in like manner, he that should receive "a righteous man," a true disciple of Christ, out of love to his character and his master, would receive a reward meet to be bestowed on a righteous man. Yea, if any man should give to one of the meanest of Christ's disciples a cup of water to drink, because he was regarded as a disciple, having no other means in his power by which to testify his love; even this inconsiderable service should by no means pass unnoticed or without a gracious recompense.—'How great soever your persecutions are, and how dangerous ... soever it be to profess to be a follower of Christ; yet shall no man have reason to fear the entertaining of you: for the same protection which awaits you, and the same reward that attends you, shall await those that ... receive you. It shall be, as if they had entertained not only angels, but Christ, and God himself. ... He that doth support and enable a prophet to do his work that sent him, shall receive the same reward that he should if himself had been sent to prophesy.' Hammond.—This, 'as it is a great incitement to others to express their kindness to Christ's ministers, and faithful servants; so it is also to his ministers to apply themselves to his service with a ready mind, and with the utmost diligence in execution of their pastoral charge.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The Lord never encourages us to pray for any thing which he is not ready to bestow in answer to our prayers. "From his fulness" ministers, in every age, receive their ordinary qualifications, even as the apostles did their miraculous powers: he is our Head of authority and influence, the Fountain of honour, wisdom, power, and holiness; and all true ministers have their commission and instructions from him, in whatever way they obtain their outward designation to that office. Though they cannot miraculously cure men's bodies; yet, by the power of Christ, they are healers of souls, and deliverers from the bondage and possession of the devil.—Whatever a vain world may think, the names of Christ's apostles are far more justly honourable, than those of the most powerful monarchs, the most illustrious conquerors, or the most celebrated philosophers or legislators, which are renowned in the records of mankind; and it in no degree deducted from their true honour, that some of them had been fishermen, and that one had been a publican. They all were sinners, saved by grace alone; and they spake and acted as those who were conscious of it; and having been deeply humbled for their sins, and made joyful in the salvation of God, they were full of love to their Lord and Saviour; and longed above all things to recommend him to their fellow-sinners on every side. This is the grand peculiarity of that minister, who is 'moved by the Holy Ghost to take the office upon him:' but many have the outward appointment, who are strangers and enemies to this inward determination and desire.—Indeed, there was one traitor among the apostles; who's infamy is indelible; and this will at last be proportionably the case of all who, bearing this sacred office, habitually "seek their own, not the things of Jesus Christ."—At present, Providence must direct us where to exercise our ministry; for every restriction is now taken off, and we are authorized "to preach the gospel to every creature." There are lost sheep in every land, as well as "of the house of Israel;" and we must seek them out, wherever scattered in this wicked world, that they may be brought home to "the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls."

V. 7—15. It is always needful to introduce the gospel, by "preaching repentance towards God," as well as "faith in our Lord Jesus Christ:" for his kingdom never was, nor ever can be, set up in a proud, carnal, and impenitent heart.—Nothing can be more important to usefulness, than to avoid all appearance of a mercenary disposition. Many, who profess great things in various ways, with some ambiguous reference to the power of Christ, and faith in his name, stand detected, in the judgment of every cautious inquirer, by this single mark: 'They make their pretensions a very lucrative trade, and turn what they wish should be believed to be the gift of God, into ready money.' But of all employments, by which men grow rich, live in splendour or luxury, or aggrandize their families, none is more infamous than that of a hireling minister: and it is peculiarly honourable, when they, who have other means of decent subsistence, preach the gospel to the poor as freely as they have received it. Yet those who are not in circumstances to do this, may very lawfully and honourably receive a maintenance for their services; for "the labourer is worthy of his meat:" and if they be sent to places, where they have but little prospect of support, they should go on in their ministry with simplicity and diligence, casting all their care upon the Lord. He will no doubt provide what is really needful: and they will generally see his hand in the way in which they are supplied; and taste his love in their temporal provision, even more than those who do have greater abundance; nor need they scruple to receive what is thus conferred; as it will not deduct from the independence and true dignity of the ministerial character. The preacher of the gospel is the ambassador of peace, and his commission reaches the vilest sinners; yet he should associate with the most pious and conscientious persons in every place: for though proud self-righteous morality or religion indisposes men to receive the gospel, yet the fear of God possessing the heart, is a real preparation for the embracing of it. Ministers should manifest steadiness and consistency in their conduct, an evident indifference about outward accommodation, and moderation in all things. Their demeanour should be expressive of benevolence: and their friendly language, fervent prayers, and pious discourse, should be substituted in the stead of those hollow compliments and flatteries, by which so many hide their selfishness.—Diligent labours in the cause of Christ are never in vain; and the prayers of his servants for others will surely bring down blessings on themselves. Their good will, however, must not degenerate into timidity; the whole counsel of God must be declared; and they, who will not attend to the gracious message, must be shown in the most decisive manner, by words and deeds, that their conduct is abhorred, and their state considered most dangerous and deplorable. This will generally be done to better effect, by declining to associate with them, and by showing a determination to have no fellowship in their perishing, sinful pleasures and pursuits.—The gospel, though not at present confirmed with miracles wrought by the preachers, is so authenticated by external and internal evidence; and when faithfully declared, so manifests its divine authority to every man's conscience; that all who reject it "hate the light because their deeds are evil." So that, even when enemies of the truth are free from great enormities in their visible conduct, their doom will be more dreadful in a future state, than that of the inhabitants of Sodom. This should be seriously laid to heart by all who hear the gospel, lest their privileges should only serve to increase their future condemnation. (Marg. Ref. m. v. 15.)

V. 16—33. The ministers of the gospel should advert to their character and situation, and count their cost: they are "sent forth as sheep in the midst of wolves;" let them then remember to be harmless and gentle as lambs and doves, not resisting evil, nor retorting reproaches and injuries. Let them study to temper zeal and boldness with prudence and discretion; and so to act, that their enemies may find no plausible pretext for their malignity. But this "wisdom is from above," and must be sought by earnest prayer, or it will degenerate into a time-serving caution. Yet, did they perfectly unite "the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove," they could not escape the hatred and contempt of men.—Those who decidedly take the Lord's part against an ungodly world, will be opposed, reviled, ensnared, and evil entreated by men in general. The most excellent servants of Christ, in all ages hitherto, have been imprisoned, scourged, and put to death, as malefactors; and they have been "brought before kings and rulers," for no other crime, than bearing the name, and preaching the gospel of Christ! In this way the Lord often brings truth to the hearing of those, who would otherwise have continued strangers to it; yet alas! this testimony commonly turns against them.—The work of the ministry requires study, preparation, and diligence: yet should the upright servant of Christ be suddenly called to declare his message, or bear testimony to the truth, before the princes of the earth; he need not be anxious how or what he should speak, but confide assuredly on Him, who has promised to give his people "a mouth and wisdom which all their enemies shall not be able to gainsay or resist."—Opportunities of doing good may be expected in every place; we are not therefore required to stay among enraged persecutors; yet nothing must cause us to neglect our work, or conceal our relation and obligations to Christ. If then we be ready to faint or murmur on account of the difficulties which we meet with, we should look to our Lord and Master; for we sinners surely should be willing to experience the same treatment from the world, which the divine Saviour did. And yet we none of us are reviled, insulted, or made to suffer as he was. Let us then pray for deliverance from the fear of man; and if we are falsely accused, let us wait for the Lord's coming, "who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of all hearts, and then shall every" faithful servant "have praise of God." Let us boldly profess and plainly declare his truth, without regard to consequences. And even if we should be called to seal our testimony with our blood, we should fear apostacy far more than the most agonizing tortures: for "man can only kill the body," and cannot hurt the soul; but the Lord "is able to destroy both body and soul in hell." "If any man draw back, he will have no pleasure in him;" and he only, "who endureth unto the end, shall be saved." The Saviour is likewise able to support and comfort us under the sharpest sufferings, and to protect us in the most extreme perils; and without Him, the believer's Father and Friend, who has loved him with an everlasting love, the most trivial event cannot take place.—Let us then boldly confess Christ, and simply obey him before men; assured that he will own us poor sinners, as his brethren, before his Father's throne. But wo be to them who are ashamed of him and his words among their fellow-creatures, or who deny him before his enemies; for Christ will disown them at that solemn season, when eternal happiness or misery will be awarded by his omnipotent word.

V. 34—42. How desperate must be the enmity of the carnal heart against God, when the gospel of grace and peace excites, in those to whom it is proposed, the most rancorous malice, dissolving all the bonds of relative and social life, and prompting to the most unnatural murders and massacres! and when the most excellent and beneficent of the human race, who deserve to be universally revered and loved, become the objects of general contempt and hatred! To this day, the zealous believer's most inveterate foes are often "those of his own household."—We should, however, remember, that we also are "by nature children of wrath, even as others:" and if we now love the truth, the cause, and the servants of Christ, all the praise is due to him who "hath made us to differ" by his special grace. This consideration should teach us to bear our cross patiently and meekly; and to pity and pray for our deluded adversaries.—No personal or relative regards must interfere with our loveto the divine Saviour, or with any requisite expressions of it; for he will not endure a rival in our hearts. And let us ask ourselves, Can father or mother, son or daughter, do us the service at that awful period, which He can? Have they done so much to deserve our love? Or are they so worthy of it? Surely our own hearts will declare us unworthy of him, if we prefer any earthly object to him! Surely we ought to be willing to bear our cross, and even to be crucified for him, as he was for our sins! How then can we expect to be counted worthy of his friendship. .

we refuse to bear our lighter tribulations for his sake. And doubtless he is able to compensate all our losses for his cause; insomuch that if we lose our lives by cleaving to him, we shall never perish; but have eternal life and felicity as his most gracious recompense. Let us then abide in him, and show our love to him by kindness to his people and ministers, welcoming their message, and "esteeming them very highly in love for their work's sake;" satisfied that nothing which we do, from upright principles and pure motives, to the least of his disciples, shall fail of a proportionable and most liberal reward.

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1. This verse should have been annexed to the close of the preceding chapter, as it relates to the same subject; for the events, afterwards recorded, seem to have occurred at a different time.—When the apostles were gone forth, our Lord did not remit his labour, but continued to go from place to place, to instruct the people, and to perform beneficent miracles among them.

V. 2—6. John had continued for a considerable time in prison: and some think his faith in Jesus as the Messiah was in a measure staggered; seeing he took no notice of him, used no means to deliver him, and did not so much as openly avow himself to be the Messiah. But this is not at all likely. It is, however, evident, that his disciples were, in general, far from being satisfied that Jesus was the Messiah: they were jealous for their master's honour, and did not clearly apprehend the nature of the Messiah's kingdom; they objected to the unreserved and social manner in which Jesus and his disciples lived; and they were very backward to acknowledge him: so that John seems to have intended to procure them some decisive testimony from Christ himself, which might terminate their hesitation. Hearing therefore the report of his miracles, he sent two of his disciples to inquire of him, whether he were the Messiah, or not: this was the purport of the question.—The words translated, "He that should come," are literally "He that cometh," or is coming. (Ὁ ἐρχόμενος.)—'This was in those days the common style for the Messias. So he is styled by John himself; ... "He that cometh after me:" (3:11.) so by the multitude; ... "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord;" (21:9.) or the "King that cometh." (Luke 19:38.)' Whitby. The question therefore shows, that all the Jews in general were decided in the opinion, that the Messiah was at hand; and that if Jesus were not he, another was immediately to be expected: yet almost eighteen hundred years have now elapsed, and no other is come, they themselves being judges: how then can they evade the inference, that Jesus of Nazareth was indeed the promised Messiah?—To the question, however, thus proposed, our Lord answered, rather by actions than by words: probably, lest an explicit reply should give his enemies a handle against him. He therefore wrought many miracles in the presence of John's messengers; and ordered them to report to him what they had witnessed, as well as what they had heard; and especially to show him, that the poor and lowly had the gospel preached to them: these heard glad tidings, and received the report, whilst the rich, learned, and powerful, rejected Christ and his doctrine.—This exactly accorded to the prophecies concerning the Messiah; but was contrary to the conduct of deceivers, who, out of carnal policy, generally address themselves to the great and powerful. John had wrought no miracle: and this rendered Christ's miracles the more decisive evidence; especially as they were predicted by the same prophet, who had also foretold John's preparatory ministry, the contempt, opposition, and ill usage, which the Messiah would meet with, and his humiliation, sufferings, and death. All these considerations tend to show the wisdom and propriety of our Lord's answer.—He added, "Blessed is he, who shall not be offended in me." The prejudices of the people against a poor, afflicted, and suffering Messiah were so strong, and his doctrine and manner of life were so contrary to those of the Scribes and Pharisees, that most of them would be stumbled by what they saw and heard, and be induced to reject him; notwithstanding John's testimony, the ancient prophecies, his own miracles, and the abundant evidence which he gave of his divine authority. Yet they only would be happy, who should overcome all these prejudices, and receive him as the Messiah: and all these, whatever their previous character had been, would certainly be so. (Marg. Ref. o.)

Do we look for, &c. (3) Προσδοκωμεν, Luke 12:46. 2 Pet. 3:12. Rendered were in expectation; Luke 3:15.—The dead are raised up. (5) The widow's son at Nain had been raised just before. (Luke 7:11—21.)—Have the Gospel preached unto them.] Ευαγγελιζονται. This use of the verb seems to imply, both the imparting and the reception of the glad tidings. The poor were preached unto, and they heard the gospel gladly, which the superior persons rejected.—Offended. (6) Σκανδαλισθη. (See on Note 5:28,29, v. 29.)

V. 7—11. John came as Christ's forerunner, and large multitudes attended his ministry, and received his baptism; yet very few gave due attention to the grand object of his preaching. His testimony was, therefore, of very great importance, with those who regarded him as a prophet; and our Lord's demand, or inquiry, was suited to excite them to attentive consideration. Surely, they had not gone into the wilderness merely to see the reeds and rushes shaken by the wind: or to hear a man preach who was as easily shaken as they, by every gust of rumour or prejudice, or every change of outward circumstances! John was a man of a very different spirit he had acknowledged Jesus as the Messiah, and he still persisted in his testimony: why then did they not regard him? They had indeed gone forth, in great numbers, as men throng to gaze on a royal procession: but they could not expect to see in the desert, a man clothed in soft, or delicate and sumptuous raiment. Such persons were rather found in kings' palaces; and the people knew John to be a plain rough man, meanly clad, and mortified to all these vanities. (Note, 3:4.) What then was their object? They would doubtless answer, that they went out to see and hear a prophet, sent from God to instruct and reform them: and John was "a prophet, and more than a prophet," being the very person of whom Malachi had prophesied; and not predicting the Messiah, but pointing him out as already come.—In the passage referred to, JEHOVAH, speaking of the coming of Christ, says, "my face," and "before me:" but it is here quoted, as the language of the Father to the Son, and he therefore says, "before thy face," and, "thy way before thee:" so that to prepare the way of Christ, was "to prepare the way of the LORD, of JEHOVAH;" for "He and the Father are One."—Our Lord added, that of all born of women, (that is, of all mere men,) there had not arisen a greater than John the Baptist; not one more holy, zealous, faithful, and humble; not one, who was employed in a more high and honourable service; not one who had been favoured with clearer views of evangelical truth; not one, who had been thus distinguished by being himself the subject of prophecy. And yet, "the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than he." The least of the apostles, or New Testament prophets, who were called to establish the Messiah's kingdom, would be further enlightened in the knowledge of his person, obedience, atonement, and mediation; and be employed in a more distinguished service, and more abundantly endued with the Holy Spirit, than John had been; and would possess miraculous powers, which John did not. If we extend the passage to all faithful ministers of the gospel, or to all true believers, (as many do,) it can only relate to the superior excellency of the new dispensation, and the more distinct views of the nature and glory of the gospel, with which they are favoured: for, in respect of personal excellence and usefulness, few believers or ministers have been found greater than John, or indeed equal to him. (Marg. Ref.)—But the first interpretation is most satisfactory.

V. 12. With the ministry of John, the New Testament dispensation began to be introduced, and "the kingdom of heaven" to be preached: and, whilst the careless, the formal, the moral, and the learned in general, disregarded it, persons of the worst characters, (who might previously have rather been expected violently to plunder men's houses,) with great earnestness sought admission into the Messiah's kingdom: so that it seemed to suffer violence, and "the violent seized it by force:" and they, who were supposed not to have the least right to these blessings, obtained possession of them; while the scribes, Pharisees, priests, and rulers, who considered the benefits of the Messiah's coming as their own unalienable inheritance, were excluded, and the publicans and harlots entered before them.

Suffereth violence.] Βιαζεται. Rendered Presseth into it; Luke 16:16. In Luke the middle verb is used actively: but in the present instance it is translated passively; and the context confirms the translation. The persons intended were so deeply convinced, and so strongly excited by our Lord's preaching the kingdom of God, that they vehemently broke through every hindrance, to their entrance into it. (A βια, vis.)—The violent.] Βιασται. (A βια.) Not used elsewhere in the New Testament.—Take it by force.] Ἁρπαζουσιν. John 6:15. 10:28,29.

V. 13—15. All the prophets, and Moses in the law, both by types and express predictions, foretold the coming of the Messiah as a future event: but John declared him to be at hand, and even pointed him out as already come. And if the people would receive and believe this open declaration, John was indeed the very person, who had been predicted under the name of Elijah, as sent to prepare the way of the Messiah. This information highly concerned all men; and every one, who was capable of hearing, was bound to listen to it, as a truth immediately connected with his duty and happiness. (Marg. Ref. f.)—This is the obvious meaning of the concluding sentence, which is often repeated: and the limitation of it, to those who have 'an inward hearing ear,' in the most direct manner tends to prevent the effect, which is most evidently intended; namely, to excite universal attention.

V. 16—19. Our Lord next exposed the perverseness of the Jews, by an apt similitude. They resembled sullen children; who, being out of temper, quarrel with all the attempts of their fellows to please them, or to induce them to join in those diversions, for which they met in the market-places. Their companions aimed to engage them by piping a cheerful tune; but they peevishly refused to dance to it: and if they represented a more doleful scene, and imitated the mournful strains used at the houses of the dead, they refused to lament. Such a capricious and sullen disposition is often observed in children, and thought deserving of sharp rebukes and corrections; yet in a matter of infinite importance, the people of that generation copied it! The Lord employed different means to bring them to repentance, and to prepare them for the blessings of the gospel; but they opposed and objected to all. John the Baptist came in a very abstemious and austere manner, as a mortified recluse, who would not join their feasts; and they said, 'he is melancholy, lunatic, and possessed with a devil.' The Son of Man (the Messiah, the most honourable of the sons of men) came in a more free and social manner. He ate and drank such things as were set before him, without any peculiar austerity: and he partook of their entertainments as circumstances required; yet instead of being pleased by his condescending, courteous, and social demeanour, they, with a mixture of malevolence and absurdity, called him "a glutton and a wine-bibber;" and because he went among publicans and notorious sinners, to reform them, they accused him of loving their characters and company. But the divine wisdom, displayed in these appointments, and in all others, would be perceived, approved, and adored by the children of wisdom; that is, by all who are born and taught of God, and thus made wise unto eternal salvation.—All these are both taught and inclined by grace, to adore the "depth of the riches both of the knowledge and wisdom of God," in those dispensations and purposes which they do not understand; to give him credit for wisdom, and justice, and goodness, where they do not perceive them; and to understand many of his designs and appointments, which to others appear perplexed and unsuitable. (Notes, Rom. 11:33—36. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.)—Gluttonous. (19) This is stronger than the original: Φαγος και οινοποτης, "An eater, and a drinker of wine."

V. 20—24. Our Lord, having exposed the perverseness of the Jews in general, upbraided some of those cities in which he had wrought most of his miracles, because their inhabitants continued still impenitent. After having denounced a wo on Chorazin and Bethsaida, two cities in Galilee, to which he had frequently resorted; he declared, that if such miracles as they had witnessed had been wrought in Tyre and Zidon, those wealthy, luxurious, commercial cities, the destruction of which the prophets had repeatedly denounced; the inhabitants would long before have shown the most expressive signs of deep repentance and humiliation.—We are not competent to solve every difficulty in this subject, or fully to understand it: it suffices, that Christ knew the hearts of the impenitent Jews to be more hardened in rebellion and enmity, and less susceptible of suitable impressions from his doctrine and miracles, than those of the inhabitants of Tyre and Zidon would have been; and therefore their final condemnation would be proportionably more intolerable.—And, as to Capernaum, which was a prosperous city, where he had chiefly resided after his entrance upon his public ministry; it had been, as it were, exalted to heaven by extraordinary privileges: but these would only tend to sink the inhabitants deeper into hell; for if the mighty works there performed, had been wrought in Sodom, it might have stood and prospered even to that day. The people of Capernaum must therefore expect a heavier doom, at the day of judgment, than even the vile inhabitants of Sodom. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 10:11—15. Luke 10:13—15.)—It is probable, that many inhabitants of these favoured cities professed to believe in Christ; yet they did not "repent and do works meet for repentance:" and our Lord, by upbraiding them for not repenting, emphatically showed the inefficacy of an impenitent faith.

V. 25, 26. The sovereignty of God, in vouchsafing more abundant means of instruction to one city or country, than to another which was better disposed to attend to them, might excite objections; to which perhaps Jesus answered, when he adored the divine conduct in a similar concern. He addressed the Father, as the Proprietor and Governor of the universe, who "doeth whatsoever pleaseth him" in heaven and earth: and he thanked or adored him, and professed an entire acquiescence in his wisdom, equity, and goodness, which were worthy of all adoration and praise; in that he was pleased to conceal the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven from learned scribes and the wise men of the nation, and at the same time to reveal them to the poor and unlearned; to men of weak capacities and mean education; to those, 26 Even so, Father; [p]for so it seemed good in thy sight.

27 All things [q]are delivered unto me of my Father: and [r]no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; [q]neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him.

28 [r]Come unto me, [s]all ye that labour and are heavy laden, [t]and I will give you rest.

29 Take [u]my yoke upon you, [x]and learn of me: [y]for I am meek and lowly in heart: [z]and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

who were despised for their ignorance and inexperience, but who were also simple, humble, and teachable as children. This he had done, "because it seemed good in his sight," for wise and gracious reasons which he was not pleased to assign. (Note, Eph. 1:9—12.) God did not, by any positive influence, hide the proofs of Christ's mission from the wise and prudent: they had the Scriptures in their hands; they saw or heard of his miracles, and heard, or might have heard, his doctrine: but they were blinded by pride and carnal prejudices; and he was pleased to give them up to be judicially blinded, among other reasons, perhaps, in order that the success of the gospel might evidently appear to be the effect of divine power, and not of human wisdom and sagacity. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:7.) But there was a positive influence employed, in making known the truth to the minds of the apostles and disciples. (Note, 16: 17.) '"The wise and prudent" here, are not men truly and spiritually wise; but men possessed with carnal, worldly wisdom, and with a swelling conceit of their proficiency in wisdom; both which indispose men to embrace true spiritual wisdom; and from these God is therefore said to have hid the wisdom of the gospel, because he permitted them to continue in that self-conceit and worldly-mindedness, which caused them to reject it, as being not agreeable to their inclinations and mistaken sentiments. ... The "babes" are those humble modest persons, who, having a low esteem of their own wisdom, give themselves up to the divine wisdom; and, being free from carnal and worldly affections, ... are fitted to embrace it when it is revealed. It being therefore suitable to the wisdom and good pleasure of God, who "resists the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble," to make known his will to persons so prepared to receive it, our Lord adds, "for so it seemed good in thy sight."' Whitby. (Note, 5:3.)

V. 27. This verse contains a very remarkable declaration of our Lord's personal and mediatorial dignity. The Father had "delivered all things into his hands," even all power, authority, and judgment over all creatures. (Notes, 28:18. John 3:27—36, vv. 35,36. 5:20—29.) None knew Jesus as the Son of God, but the eternal Father; even as none knew the Father, except the Son: neither could any man truly know the Father, except as the Son revealed his nature and glory to him; for this was entirely committed to him as Mediator, in respect of all the sinful race of men. This represents the Son as coequal with the Father, and as incomprehensible: and it completely demonstrates that those who reject the teaching of the Lord Jesus, as the Son of God, and do not depend on him "to reveal the Father" to them, cannot know any thing aright of that One, true, and living God, whom they profess to worship.—'There is no true knowledge of God, nor quietness of mind, but only in Christ alone.' Beza. All the worship therefore of the Jews since the nation rejected and crucified their Messiah, of Mohammedans, of modern deists, and of all unbelievers, is in fact rendered to an imaginary deity; "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus" being to them "the unknown God." V. 28—30. The divine Saviour, having thus declared his dignity and authority, invited all those "who laboured and were heavy laden" to come to him.—In some sense this includes all men: for worldly men labour like slaves, and burden themselves with fruitless cares and disquietudes about increasing wealth, or acquiring honour and pre-eminence. The dissipated and sensual labour hard, and are "heavy laden," in pursuing pleasures and diversions. The slave of Satan, and of his own lusts and passions, is the veriest drudge on earth; and if he attempt by his own strength to break loose, he labours in vain. The superstitious labour in the very fire, and are heavy laden with self-imposed burdens. The ceremonial law caused the people much labour, and laid heavy burdens on them, compared with those of the gospel. They who endeavour to "establish their own righteousness," are equally burdened and wearied in vain. The convinced, trembling, broken-hearted sinner labours under great discouragement, and is heavy laden with guilt and terror: and the tempted and afflicted believer has his labours and burdens also. In short every "heart knows its own bitterness;" but Christ invites all, who in any respect "labour and are heavy laden," to come to him, for rest to their souls: though such as laboured under a deep sense of guilt, or were heavy laden with the burdens imposed on them by the scribes and Pharisees, seem especially intended. Christ alone gives this invitation: prophets, apostles, and ministers direct men to go to the Saviour; the Father speaking from heaven, and the Spirit speaking in the heart, concur in the same instruction.—Men come to Jesus, when, feeling their guilt, misery, and inability to help themselves, and believing his love and power to help them, they seek to him in fervent prayer, and rely and wait on him for salvation. All who thus come to him, receive rest as his gift, they are released from bondage and condemnation; relieved from anxious cares, fears, and superstitions and obtain peace, satisfaction, and comfort in their hearts and consciences. (Note, Jer. 6:16,17.) But, coming to him, they must take his yoke upon them, and submit to his authority, as their Lord and Master. (Note, 7:24—27.) They must also learn of him, as their Teacher and Counsellor, all things relating to their acceptance, comfort, and obedience; especially the true knowledge of God the Father. (Notes, 27. John 17:1—3.) To encourage them in this, he assures them, that he is "meek and lowly in heart." Some explain this of the lesson which he teaches, even imitation of his meekness and lowliness: and doubtless this is necessary, and tends to inward rest and peace: for the storms, which rend the cedars on the lofty mountains, leave the lilies unmolested in the lowly valleys. But it is rather to be understood of our Lord's character as a Teacher and Ruler: he does not govern with rigour, or treat his scholars with harshness; but he deals gently with them, bears with their ignorance and incapacity, condescends to their weakness and infirmity, rejects no willing scholar, and accepts the willing servant, notwithstanding all his numerous mistakes, defects, and incidental faults. In his school and service, therefore, men "find rest to their souls," and there only. Nor need they fear his yoke: most of his commandments indeed are the same for substance with the moral law, and all coincide with it: but that "law is holy, just, and good;" and obedience tends to proportionable felicity. As it is put by the Saviour, as his yoke, upon the believer, it is deprived of its condemning power; it is enforced by evangelical motives, encouragements, and promises of assistance and gracious recompense; it is made easy by love and divine consolations; and a correspondent disposition is wrought in the heart by regenerating grace. Indeed this obedience requires self-denial, and exposes a man to difficulties in many cases; but all this is a hundred-fold compensated, even in this world, by inward peace and joy. So that Christ's yoke is easy and pleasant in itself as well as when compared with the yoke of Satan, sin, superstition, or self-righteousness, which those who reject the yoke of the Redeemer must bear. Indeed the burden of corrections, tribulations, temptations, and persecutions, to which Christ's service may expose us, would sink us, if we were left to ourselves: yet being counterpoised with internal supports, it proves "light, and is but for a moment, and works out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." (2 Cor. 4:17. Gr.) So that every way his "yoke is easy, and his burden light." (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Our divine Redeemer was unwearied in his arduous labour of love: surely then, we "should not be weary of well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—The dispensations of Providence, in laying aside and removing eminent ministers, at the very time when we should suppose they were peculiarly wanted, appear very mysterious: but God will not permit any servant in the least to interfere with the glory of "his beloved Son:" and he will show all men, that, though he may please to employ them in carrying on his designs, he can do without them.—Patience, in a prison or a sick room, glorifies the Lord, as well as the most active services: but, when we cannot do what we would, we should still attempt, as we can, to direct the judgment and confirm the faith of those who regard our words; and Christ will surely and greatly honour those, who thus humbly serve him.

CHAPTER XII.

The disciples pluck ears of corn on the sabbath, 1. Christ vindicates them from the charge of breaking the sabbath, 2—8; heals the withered hand of one in the synagogue; and shows it lawful to do good on the sabbath, 9—13. The Pharisees seek to kill him; he withdraws, yet works miracles, and so fulfils a prophecy of Isaiah, 14—21. He casts out a devil from a dumb and blind man, 22, 23; confutes the charge of the Pharisees, of casting out devils by Beelzebub, 24—30; and shows the sin against the Holy Ghost to be unpardonable, and that every idle word must be accounted for, 31—37. He rebukes those who sought a sign, and will give none but that of Jonah, 38—40. The Ninevites, and the queen of the south, will condemn that generation, 41, 42. By a parable he shows their awful state, 43—45. His disciples are his most endeared relations, 46—50.

AT that time Jesus [a]went on the sabbath-day through the corn; and his disciples were an hungered, and began [b]to pluck the ears of corn, and to eat.

2 But when the Pharisees saw it, they said unto him, [c]Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath-day!

3 But he said unto them, [d]Have ye not read [e]what David did, when he was an hungered, and they that were with him;

4 How he entered into the house of God, and did eat [f]the show-bread, which was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with him, but only for the priests?

5 Or have ye not read in the law, how that, [g]on the sabbath-days the priests in the temple [h]profane the sabbath, and are blameless?

honour him.—What multitudes in these lands allow that the Saviour is already come, and that they look for no other; yet, alas! how few accept of his salvation, and bow to the sceptre of his grace!—Those things, which men see and hear, if compared diligently with the Scriptures, would direct them to the true religion, and determine in what way salvation is to be found. Though outward miracles are no longer wrought; yet the effects produced, where the gospel is faithfully preached to the poor, in opening their eyes, directing their walk, delivering them from their sins, and from the power of Satan, and teaching them to lead a spiritual and holy life, abundantly prove, that it is "the power of God to the salvation" of those who believe: and the contempt with which the rich, the proud, the worldly wise, and the self-righteous regard this doctrine and these effects, forms an additional demonstration of the truth of the Scripture; for is it not written, that "the preaching of the cross is foolishness to them that perish?" But men are as apt to be offended with the doctrines, and preachers, and professors of the gospel now, as they were formerly with the lowly estate of the Redeemer; their proud and carnal prejudices are contradicted by them, and they are glad of any pretext for rejecting what they hate. Happy then is that man, whatever his past character has been, or present circumstances are, who neither stumbles at any of these things, nor yet at the call to submission, repentance, self-denial, and unreserved obedience; but, notwithstanding all, cordially believes and embraces the gospel.

V. 7—15. Alas! how unsatisfactory an account can many give, of what they go to see or hear, when they frequent places of worship, or even throng to attend on faithful preachers! They go to satisfy curiosity, or to trifle away their time: but instead of resorting together to see the shaking of a reed, or "a man clothed in soft raiment," they often mean rather to exhibit their own elegant and fashionable apparel, and to compare it with that of their neighbours!—For "soft raiment" is not at present confined to the palaces of kings; but all endeavour to wear it, whether they can or cannot afford it: and far more of it appears in worshipping assemblies, than consists with the scriptural precepts, with the glory of God, the interests of families, the good of the poor, or the prosperity of souls. The Lord, however, will call on those who go to hear his word, to give an account of their motives in so doing, as well as those who absent themselves, for the reasons of their neglect. We should therefore attend, in order to hear the messengers of the Lord, who come to prepare the way, that his kingdom may be set up in our hearts: and as, in some respects, the least of faithful ministers, who now preach the gospel, is greater than all who came before the introduction of that dispensation, it behooves us to "give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip." (Note, Heb. 2:1—4.) Considering our superior light and information, "what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness!"

In every age, "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." The most atrocious transgressors, who "strive to enter in at the strait gate," who wrestle in prayer, and are in earnest about their souls, outstrip their more moral and decent neighbours, who are supine, dilatory, and lukewarm. They who are determined, at all adventures, to find admission, will surely succeed: but such as postpone the concerns of their souls to worldly interest, pleasures, and diversions, will be found to come short of it; as well as those who seek salvation in any other way, than "by repentance towards God, and faith" in his beloved Son. To him, both "Moses, and all the prophets," and John the Baptist, and all the apostles and evangelists "bear witness, that whosoever believeth in him, shall receive remission of sins." This we must attest, whether men will receive it or not; and call on all, "who have ears to hear," seriously to attend to it.

V. 16—24. Natural depravity causes even sensible men to act with childish folly in the most important concerns of their immortal souls. Their cavils are often at the same time most futile and malignant; their dislike to the message of Christ dictates objections to the messengers; something they have to urge against every one, however excellent and holy. Being determined to be displeased, they put a bad construction on their best actions: their self-denial and abstraction from the world arise from melancholy or misanthropy; their cheerfulness from levity; their benevolent sociableness, from intemperance or love of good cheer; their endeavours to reform the profligate are ascribed to a congeniality of disposition, and to dislike of morality and goodness; their different natural tempers, or methods of doing good, are but varied modes of mischief: and, in short, men will censure any thing and every thing, in order to excuse themselves from joining the servants of Christ, in mourning for sin, or in seeking happiness from God, and improving their talents in glorifying God, and doing good to mankind. In vain may we hope to escape the perverse and unreasonable calumnies of such men, as said that John the Baptist was a demoniac, and "the holy One of God" "a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend" and companion "of publicans and sinners." These are the children of unbelief and folly: but wisdom's children welcome the messengers of God, and bless him for them, and for their different gifts and endowments: and they admire and adore the divine wisdom, even in those things, at which ungodly men cavil to their own eternal ruin.—Our blessed Lord will never upbraid the trembling penitent with any of his iniquities: but he will sharply rebuke and awfully condemn those, who continue impenitent under the means of grace. He knows the different degrees of enmity and obduracy which possess the hearts of unbelievers, and will proportion their final punishment accordingly: but it will be far more tolerable for pagans in the day of judgment, than for wicked professors of Christianity.—The Lord, in wise and righteous sovereignty, sends the gospel to whom he pleases; yet he punishes none more than they deserve, and rejects none that seek teaching and salvation from him. But it behooves those, who have been exalted even to heaven with outward advantages, to fear lest they should sink the deeper into hell, through their abuse of them: and there can be no doubt, that multitudes of the inhabitants of this favoured land will perish with deeper condemnation than those of Tyre, and even than those of Sodom and Gomorrah.

V. 25—30. Whilst the eternal Son, with all his holy angels, and his redeemed people, adore and praise the Father and Lord of all, for hiding the mysteries of redeeming love "from the wise and prudent, and revealing them to" the unlearned, even "to babes, because it so seemeth good in his sight;" the proud and impenitent blaspheme his holy appointments, and treat such declarations with the most pointed scorn and detestation. Thus the wise and prudent of this world often illustrate and demonstrate the truth which they oppose: they show that nothing but divine teaching can make known divine things, in their real nature and glory: and they evince the propriety of the Lord's leaving them to be blinded by their prejudices, seeing their arrogance and enmity more than equal their superior knowledge and sagacity.—But all things are given into the hands of our Redeemer: we cannot know either the Father or the Son, except by the teaching of the holy word, and the Holy Spirit: we can know nothing of the one, apart from the other: and as none can "know the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him:" so he must know the most in this matter, who sits at Christ's feet with the greatest docility and simplicity, to hear and believe his words.—The Redeemer's mercy and condescension equal his majesty, and he invites the labouring and burdened sinner to come to him for rest. Why then should any labour for that which is not bread, or seek rest from any other quarter? Let us come to him daily for deliverance from wrath and guilt, from sin and Satan, from all our cares, fears, and sorrows: let us learn of him as our Prophet, rely on him as our Priest, bear his yoke as our King, and copy his example of meekness and lowliness of heart. And, whatever impiety or infidelity may object,—whatever the world, the flesh, and the devil may suggest,—we shall find "his yoke easy and his burden light:" his service perfect freedom and rest to our souls; and that "in keeping his commandments there is great reward."

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1, 2. Matthew seems to fix the date of this transaction immediately after the events recorded in the preceding chapter; but the other evangelists record it in an earlier part of our Lord's history. (Notes, Mark 2:23—28. Luke 6:1—11.)—The Jewish writers say, that it was not customary for the people to taste food till after the service at the synagogue: but this must be one of "the traditions of the elders;" for the Scripture never mentions it; nor 6 But I say unto you, [f]That in this place is one greater than the temple.

7 But [g]if ye had known what this meaneth, [h]I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have [i]condemned the guiltless.

8 For [k]the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath-day.

9 ¶And when he was departed thence, [l]he went into their synagogue:

10 And, behold, there was a man [m]which had his hand withered. And they asked him, saying, [n]Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-days? [o]that they might accuse him.

11 And he said unto them, [p]What man shall there be among you, that shall have one sheep, [q]and if it fall into a pit on the sabbath-day, will he not lay hold on it, and lift it out?

12 How much then [r]is a man better than a sheep! Wherefore [s]it is lawful to do well on the sabbath-days.

13 Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth; [t]and it was restored whole like as the other.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ Then the Pharisees [u]went out, and [v]held council against him, how they might destroy him.

15 But when Jesus knew it, [w]he withdrew himself from thence: [x]and great multitudes followed him, and he healed them all;

16 And [y]charged them, that they should not make him known:

17 That [z]it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet, [a]saying,

18 Behold [b]my Servant, [c]whom I have chosen; [d]my Beloved, in whom my soul is well pleased: [e]I will put my Spirit upon him, [f]and he shall show judgment to the Gentiles.

19 He [g]shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets.

20 A [h]bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, [i]till he send forth judgment unto victory.

is it, on this occasion, once hinted at.—In going to the synagogue on the sabbath, or in returning from it, the disciples being hungry, plucked the ears of corn, rubbed them in their hands, and ate. The law allowed them to take the produce of any man's field or vineyard, in this manner, as they passed through it. (Note, Deut. 23:24,25.) But the Pharisees, who, as has been very probably supposed, were deputed by the chief priests and rulers to watch the conduct of Jesus and his followers, condemned this action as a profanation of the sabbath; considering it as in some respects equivalent to reaping and thrashing the grain; and intending to involve Jesus also under the same accusation.

On the sabbath-day. (1) Τοις σαββασι, on the sabbaths. By comparing this whole passage (2,5,8,12,) with the parallel passages in Mark and Luke, it clearly appears, that the plural of σαββας, and the singular σαββατον, are used indiscriminately for the seventh day of the week. Luke mentions the particular sabbath on which this event occurred. (Luke 6:1,6.)

V. 3, 4. In answering the charge of the Pharisees, our Lord first referred them to the conduct of David, when he fled from Saul: intimating that they were very deficient in the knowledge of the Scriptures, though they prided themselves on their learning in this respect, and despised the common people. They allowed that David was a prophet, and "the man after God's own heart:" yet in circumstances of urgent necessity, he had not scrupled to infringe the injunction of the ritual law by eating the show-bread and giving it to his attendants: though the law required that none but the priests should eat of it. (Marg. Ref. f.) He had indeed been blamed, and had condemned himself for other parts of his conduct; yet this was never deemed criminal, the necessity of the case being allowed as a sufficient reason for dispensing with a ceremonial institution. Why then should Jesus's disciples be condemned, even if they had deviated from the exact letter of the law to satisfy the cravings of their hunger? (Notes, Ex. 20:8—11.)—'It is a small thing to say, it is lawful for us to eat the bread removed from the table; it would be lawful for us, in this extreme hunger, even to eat the bread now sanctified on the table, if there were no other.' Kinchi in Whitby.

The show-bread. (4) Τους αρτους της προθεσεως. Mark 2: 26. Luke 6:4.—Ἡ προθεσεις των αρτων. Heb. 9:2.—Panes expositionis: exposito panum. (Note, Lev. 24:5—9.)—But only.] Ει μη. Luke 4:26,27. John 17:12. Rev. 9:4.

V. 5, 6. Our Lord next showed his accusers, that in some cases, the exact rest of the sabbath must be dispensed with, or the ritual observances must be neglected: for the priests, at the temple performed a great deal of labour on the sabbath, in preparing the sacrifices, and tending the fire on the altar; which work, being done by others, or in another place, would certainly have been a violation of the law: yet it was allowed that they were blameless in what they did. (Note, John 7:19—24, vv. 22—24.) And, whether the Pharisees would regard it or not, there was before them One "greater than the temple;" even the true Temple, "in which the fulness of God dwelleth bodily,"—the human nature of EMMANUEL; and therefore in attending and obeying Him, the strict rest of the sabbath might be dispensed with. (Marg. Ref.)—'All that work, done by priests, ... was ... for the service of the temple: whereas the service done by the disciples to their Lord, was ... to one much greater than the temple, both in respect of dignity, as being a divine person, and ... as being ... sanctified even in his human nature, by the inhabitation of the Spirit, and of the fulness of the Godhead in him.' Whitby.

Profane. (5) Βεβηλουσι. Acts 24:6. Neh. 13:18. Ez. 43:7, 8. Sept.—Βεβηλος. 1 Tim. 1:9. 4:7. 2 Tim. 2:16. Heb. 12:16.

V. 7, 8. The passage here referred to has been before considered. (Notes, 9:10—13. Hos. 6:6.) Had the Pharisees understood what was meant, when God declared, that he required mercy rather than sacrifice, "they would not have condemned the guiltless:" for, relieving the disciples' hunger, in subserviency to their attendance on Jesus in his labours of love, was an act of mercy sufficient to justify so trivial a deviation from the exact rest of the sabbath. And in conclusion he added, "The Son of Man is Lord even of the sabbath:" He, the Messiah, was Lord and Ruler of his church, in this and every other particular. Thus he intimated that, as the Son of God, he had at first instituted the sabbath; that he gave the law from mount Sinai; and that he had lost none of his authority by his humiliation, but should make such alterations in the time and circumstances of observing this sacred rest, as it became him, the great Lawgiver, in respect of his own institutions.—It cannot be supposed that Christ would so frequently have discussed this subject, and shown what works were lawful on the sabbath-day, without allowing of any other exceptions, if it had not been intended that the institution, for the substance of it, should continue in full force under the Christian dispensation.

V. 9—13. When Jesus had silenced the Pharisees, he departed: and on another sabbath he entered into one of their synagogues, when the same subject was again brought forward. (Notes, Mark 3:1—5. Luke 13:10—17.) As a man whose hand was withered attended at the synagogue: the Pharisees, ever watching to find matter of accusation, asked our Lord whether it was lawful to heal on the sabbath. This general question, if meant to include the inquiry, how far the various labours attending cures by medicine were consistent with hallowing the sabbath, was not without difficulty; for while many things, generally practised in this respect, are works of necessity and mercy, others doubtless might very well be postponed.—It seems, therefore, from the other evangelists, that Jesus answered in the first instance by another and more simple question, "Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath-day?" He would, however, neither be diverted from his purpose of mercy by their objections, nor yet give them that ground of accusation for which they sought: and he therefore asked them, whether, if a single sheep should fall into a pit on the sabbath, any one of their company, strict as they professed to be, would omit to pull it out, either from regard to the value of his property, or out of compassion to the animal. Yet this would be attended with labour, whilst his healing miracles were performed without any. But how much more valuable is a rational creature, possessed of an immortal soul, than a mere animal! And how much more requisite, according to the law of love, to bring immediate relief to the distresses of the one, than the other! Wherefore, it must be consistent with the divine law to perform those actions of mercy and love on the sabbath-day, which were evidently good in themselves, and ornamental to piety. Having thus silenced them, he ordered the man to stretch forth his withered hand; and by the power attending his word, the man found his hand immediately and perfectly restored.

V. 14—21. The Pharisees, not being able to answer our Lord's reasoning, and exasperated by being put to shame; as well as anxious for their authority, and the credit of their traditions; took counsel together, by what means they might destroy him, or find some plausible accusation against him that he might be condemned to death as a deceiver or blasphemer. But Jesus, aware of their design, (as "his time was not yet come,") thought proper to retire from that place: yet, being followed by great multitudes of the people, he continued to heal all the sick who were brought to him; strictly charging them at the same time not to speak of his miracles, nor to let the Pharisees know where he was. (Note, 9:30.) Thus he evidently fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah concerning the Messiah. (Note, Is. 42:1—4.) The passage has already been explained: but it may here be added, that the gentle, lowly, compassionate, condescending, and beneficent nature of Christ's miracles and personal ministry, devoid of ostentation and severity; and his perseverance in the midst of opposition, without engaging in contentious disputation; as well as the general effects and success of his gospel, and his kind and tender dealing with weak, discouraged, and tempted believers, in all ages, are described in it. In the prophecy of Isaiah, we read, "He shall bring forth judgment unto truth; he shall not fail, nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth, and the isles shall wait for his law;" which is here rendered "till he send forth judgment unto victory, and in his name shall the Gentiles trust." When the cause of the gospel, and that of our Lord's servants against his enemies, shall be tried, and "judgment shall be brought forth unto truth," they will also be made victorious; when the Gentiles learn to trust in his name, they also "wait for his law;" and when all nations shall thus trust in him, judgment will be set or established in the earth.—Flax was used in lamps: smoking flax may therefore be equivalent to an expiring lamp.—'He that stretcheth not forth his hand to the sinner, and he that beareth not the burden of his brother, breaks the bruised reed: ... and he that despiseth the small spark of faith in little ones, quenches the smoking flax.' Jerome. The evangelist quotes the last clause of this passage from the Septuagint, and no more. In many things the prophet's meaning is mistaken or obscured in that version; as it is evident from the annexed translation, which is literal: but Matthew gives the meaning of the Hebrew, yet not attending to literal exactness; which in an inspired writer was the less necessary.—'Jacob, my servant, I will uphold him; Israel, my elect, my soul hath accepted him: I have given (or put,) my Spirit on him. He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not cry aloud, he shall not relax; neither shall his voice be heard without. He shall not crush a bruised reed, and smoking flax he shall not quench, but shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall shine forth and shall not be broken; until he place judgment in the earth: and in his name shall the Gentiles hope.' Sept. —Thus the whole is ascribed to Israel as a nation, instead of being understood of the Messiah.—The Septuagint, though highly venerable, has acquired disproportionate reverence, from the notion that the writers of the New Testament confine themselves to it in their citations: but in fact, they quote it, only when it accords to the Hebrew, or gives the sense of it without material alteration.

The Gentiles trust. (21) Comp. Ps. 146:3. Jer. 17:5. Rom. 15:12. Eph. 1:12.

V. 22—24. It is probable, that this miracle was wrought some time after what is before recorded. (Note, Luke 11:14—26.)—An evil spirit having deprived a man of sight and speech, the power of Christ ejecting the evil spirit perfectly restored him.—'As it is not said that Christ gave this man his hearing, it is plain he was not deaf, and indeed it appears worthy of remark, that we hardly ever meet with entire blindness and deafness in the same person.' Doddridge.—This miracle seems to have astonished the people in an uncommon degree; and it led them to conclude that Jesus must be the Messiah, the Son of David; which exasperated the Pharisees, and made them fear that he would finally prevail: yet they could not deny the reality of the miracle; and therefore they malignantly renewed their accusation, that he cast out devils by the concurrence of Beelzebub the prince of the devils, with whom he had formed an alliance. (Notes, 9:32—34.) 'This they did, not only from an apprehension, that if this belief prevailed, it might bring the power of the Romans upon them: (John 11:48.) but chiefly, because it put an end to their credit with, and authority over, the people; they being still represented by our Lord, as blind guides and the worst of hypocrites.' Whitby. The term employed on this occasion (οὗτος) is very properly rendered "this fellow," as expressive of contempt and aversion.—Beelzebub is the same as Baalzebub, the god of Ekron in Philistia. (2 Kings 1:3.) The name signifies the lord of a fly: but the Greek word here used (βεελζεβουλ) signifies the lord of a dunghill.—'The heathens fabulously write of the temple of Hercules and Jupiter, that the Deity kept the flies from them; ... the Jews say of their temple, that a fly was not seen in the slaughter-house.' Whitby. 'The god of the Ekronites was called Baal-zebub, either for the plenty of flies with which his temple abounded, or because they sought help from that idol, against the flies with which they were troubled. This name the Israelites after for the contempt of that idol, gave to the prince of the devils. —Beelzebul signifies the god of dung.' Leigh. He is called Satan in our Lord's answer. (26)

Dumb. (32) Κωφος. '1. Propriè: obtusus, hebes à κοπτω. Sic ligitur apud Homerum, Il. λ'. v. 390, κωφον βελος telum obtusum.—2. Qui sensum amisit, nihil sentiens, &c.' (answering to σιωπων, 20.) 11:14. deaf; 11:5. Mark 7:32,37. 9:25. Luke 7:22.—Δυσκωφον και κωφον. Sept. rendered, "The dumb or deaf." Ex. 4:11. Zacharias appears to have been deaf as well as dumb: Note, Luke 1:21—25.; but no other instance occurs in the N. T. in which it clearly embraces both ideas.

V. 25, 26. It seems that the Pharisees privately circulated this opinion; but "Jesus knew their thoughts," and took occasion to argue the case with them. Probably they grounded their opinion on his disregard to their traditions, and his supposed violation of the sabbath: but he rested his argument on the evident tendency and effect of his doctrine and example, to render men wise and holy, to deliver them from the power of sin and Satan, and to make them servants and worshippers of God; for these were such, that as far as his cause prevailed, Satan's kingdom must be subverted. As, therefore, these fallen spirits are too politic and sagacious to assist in ruining their own cause; and as every kingdom or family which is divided into parties contending against each other must be weakened, desolated, and ruined; so it was evident, that if Satan aided Jesus in casting out devils, the infernal kingdom was divided against itself; and how then could it any longer subsist?—Nothing can be more conclusive than this argument.

Is brought to desolation. (25) Ερημουται (ab ερημος, desertus:) Luke 11:17. Rev. 17:16. 18:16.

V. 27, 28. It is plain that there were those who made it their business to expel evil spirits from possessed persons; (Acts 19:13—16.) and that some of them were countenanced by the Pharisees. Now these exorcists might be left to determine the cause between Jesus and his accusers; if they asserted, that he "cast out devils by the prince of the devils," they could not prove that their own children, or disciples, cast them out by any other power. And if they ascribe the exorcisms of these persons to the assistance of God; how could they doubt of those effected by Jesus being the same, when they were every way so vastly superior: and when his life was so indisputably holy, and his instructions so scriptural, and of so excellent a tendency? It was also undeniable, that if he "by the Spirit of God cast out devils, then the kingdom of God was come unto them." He was certainly the promised Messiah, and they who opposed or rejected him, would do it at their peril.—'You doubt not but your exorcists, who use the name of God, the God of Abraham, &c. do cast out devils by virtue of that name: it will then be matter of your condemnation, ... to pass such an unjust censure on me. Whitby.—'Christ uses this as an argument ad homines; that they who themselves professed to cast out devils by the God of Abraham, had no reason to say, that he did it by the prince of devils.' Hammond.

By the Spirit of God. (28) "By the finger of God." (Luke 11:20. Note, Ex. 8:18,19.)

V. 29, 30. The case might be illustrated by an apt similitude. How could any one enter into a strong man's house, whilst he was on his guard, and plunder his property at his pleasure, unless he first overpowered and bound the strong man? Thus it was evident, that Jesus by his divine pow er man's house, and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man? and then he will spoil his house.

30 He [f]that is not with me is against me, and he that [g]gathereth not with me scattereth abroad.

[Practical Observations.]

31 Wherefore I say unto you, [h]All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men: [i]but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, shall not be forgiven unto men.

32 And [k]whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; [l]but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, [m]it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come.

33 ¶ Either [n]make the tree good, [o]and his fruit good; or else make the tree corrupt, and his fruit corrupt: for the tree is known by his fruit.

34 O [p]generation of vipers, [q]how can ye, being evil, speak good things? [r]for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

35 A [s]good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things: [t]and an evil man out of [u]the evil treasure bringeth forth evil things.

36 But I say unto you, That [v]every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment.

37 For by thy words thou shalt be [x]justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned.

was able to subdue and limit the power of Satan; or he could never rescue the bodies and souls of men from his oppression. And, as he came to "destroy the works of the devil," so the cause would admit of no neutrality. Every one who should refuse to join him against the cause of Satan, would be adjudged an enemy; and all who would not concur with him in rescuing sinners from the devil's kingdom, and bringing them into the kingdom of God, whatever pains they might take in any other way, would do worse than lose their labour; for all their contrivances, knowledge, and religious observances, would tend to their own loss and that of others, and they would finally lose their own souls.

V. 31, 32. (Marg. Ref.) Scarcely any thing, in the whole Scripture, has given more discouragement to weak Christians than this passage, and a few others coincident with it. (Notes, Mark 3:22—30. Luke 12:8—10. Heb. 6:4—6. 10:26,27. 1 John 5:16—18.) Almost every humble and conscientious believer at one time or other is tempted to think that he has committed the unpardonable sin; and the interpretations which many have given, without properly adverting to the context, have frequently tended to increase these apprehensions and difficulties. In general we are sure that they who indeed repent, and believe the gospel, have not committed this sin, or any other of the same kind: for repentance and faith are inseparably connected with forgiveness; and they are the special gift of God, which he would not bestow on any man, if he were determined never to pardon him. On the other hand, without repentance and faith, no man can be forgiven, though he have not committed this sin.—It is probable that this matter was left in some measure of obscurity, to deter men from presumptuously venturing near the brink of so dreadful a precipice.—The words were addressed immediately, as a solemn warning, to the proud and malignant Pharisees. Our Lord first declared, that "all manner of sin and blasphemy should be forgiven unto men;" perhaps tacitly comparing the happy situation of men under a dispensation of mercy, with that of apostate angels for whom there is no forgiveness. But, though this was a general rule, it admitted of one exception; for "the blasphemy against the Spirit should never be forgiven." Whoever had spoken, or should speak, blasphemous words against "the Son of Man," might repent and be pardoned; but whoever should thus speak against the Holy Spirit, could never be pardoned, either in this world or the next. It does not hence follow, that any sin which is not forgiven here, will hereafter be forgiven: the expression at most only shows that some of the Jews had notions of this kind, as well as the papists and other professed Christians: but it seems to be no more than a form of speech common among the Jews, when they asserted strongly that any thing should never be done. The circumstances, in which this declaration was made, should carefully be adverted to. The Pharisees had spoken most blasphemous words against Christ and his miracles, which were indeed wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, but not under the immediate dispensation of the Spirit. They had gone as far in impiety as they could, without finally excluding themselves from forgiveness. They had spoken "blasphemy against the Son of Man," and ascribed his miracles to the power of the devil; but still they might be pardoned, and one further method would be used to convince them. In a short time, He, the promised Messiah, would be crucified, and then rise from the dead and ascend into heaven; when, being exalted to the right hand of the Father, he would send forth the Holy Spirit upon his apostles and disciples, enabling them to perform various wonderful works in his name, in proof of their testimony concerning his resurrection and ascension. Whosoever therefore should blaspheme this last and most complete attestation to Jesus, as the promised Messiah, and, from determined enmity to him and his kingdom, deliberately ascribe the operations of the Holy Spirit to Satan; that man would be given up to final obduracy and impenitency, and thus never be pardoned, but sink into final perdition.—'You have represented me as a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners, and as one who casts out devils by Beelzebub: and you will still go on, after all the miracles which I have done among you, to represent me as a false prophet, and a deceiver of the people: but notwithstanding, all these grievous sins shall be forgiven you, if that last dispensation of the Holy Ghost, which I shall after my ascension send among you, shall prevail with you to believe in me. But if when I have sent the Holy Ghost, to testify the truth of my mission and my resurrection, you shall continue in your unbelief, and shall blaspheme the Holy Ghost, and represent him also as an evil spirit; your sin shall never be forgiven, nor shall any thing be further done to call you to repentance.' Whitby.—None therefore could commit this sin, who did not witness the effects of the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the apostles: nor were all degrees of opposition to these operations thus finally destructive. Peter does not seem to have concluded, that Simon Magus had sinned beyond the reach of mercy, when he offered to buy the power of conferring the Holy Ghost. (Note, Acts 8:18—24.) Yet it is clear, that some kinds of apostacy, when attended with very peculiar circumstances of aggravation, through love of this world, and enmity to the truth, were equivalent to it; and in every age many provoke God to leave them to final impenitence. But there must be great opportunity of information, much inward conviction, determinate sinning against the light of a man's own conscience, deliberate enmity to the truth, and an obstinate opposition to it in defiance of evidence, to constitute this kind of impiety. They, who most fear having committed it, are generally at the greatest distance from it; while such as are thus given up, are perhaps universally either callous in presumption or enmity, or absolutely and outrageously desperate, of which we sometimes meet with awful instances: but the trembling contrite sinner has "the witness in himself," that neither of these is his case.—The Jews, to this day, ascribe the miracles of Jesus, the reality of which they do not deny, especially his casting out devils, to enchantment; that is, to the power of Satan.

Blasphemy. (31) Βλασφημια. (Α βλασφημεω, 'quasi, βλαπτω την φημην' alterius famam lædo.' Schleusner.) It is rendered blasphemy ; 15:19. 26:65. Mark 2:7. John 10:33. Col. 3:8. Rev. 13:1. et al.: evil-speaking ; Eph. 4:31. railing ; 1 Tim. 6:4. Jude 9. Injurious words in general are denoted; which, when they are spoken of men, are called evil-speaking ; but when they are supposed to relate to God, to Christ, or to the Holy Spirit, the original word blasphemy is retained. It is not however always evident, which is the proper rendering of the word; as may be seen by the above references, and especially by comparing Eph. 4:31. with Col. 3:8.—In this world. (32) Εν τουτῳ τῳ αιωνι. 13:22. Luke 16:8. Rom. 12:2. 1 Cor. 1:20. 2 Cor. 4:4. Eph. 6:12.

V. 33—37. (Notes, 3:7—10. 7:15—20.) Our Lord next showed the Pharisees his knowledge of the evil of their hearts. They were proud, carnal, malicious, ungodly men; yet they made high professions of piety and sanctity! Let them, therefore, either seek the renewal of their souls to holiness by the grace of God, or let them give up their pretensions to religion. (Notes, Ez. 18:30—32. Jam. 4:7—10.) If the tree were made good, good fruit would be produced; otherwise they might as well allow the tree to be corrupt, of which the fruit was notoriously bad; seeing the quality of the tree is known, not by its appearance, leaves, or blossoms, but by its fruit. Thus the Pharisees were detected by their malignant opposition to the holy character and doctrine of Jesus, and to his beneficent miracles. Indeed their words sufficiently determined the state of their hearts, and showed them to be a "generation of vipers," the progeny of the old serpent: how then could they speak good and holy things, habitually and consistently? For out of the abundance of the thoughts, and desires of the heart, the mouth naturally speaks. If any one be humble, pious, spiritual, a lover of God and man; his memory, judgment, and affections become a treasury of good things, from 38 ¶ Then certain of the scribes and of the Pharisees answered, saying, [y]Master, we would see a sign from thee.

39 But he answered and said unto them, An evil and [z]adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and there shall [a]no sign be given to it, but the sign of the prophet Jonas.

42 The [k]queen of the south shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it: for she came from the uttermost parts of the earth to [l]hear the wisdom of Solomon; and, [m]behold, a greater than Solomon is here!

which he brings forth edifying conversation, pious observations, candid opinions, equitable decisions, and whatever can conduce to the glory of God and the good of mankind. But wicked men have within them a treasury of pride, malice, impiety, and selfishness, from which they naturally educe evil things, nor can they, at all times, avoid venting their avarice, arrogance, envy, or enmity against true religion; and speaking boasting, reproachful, and injurious language. Thus the Pharisees betrayed themselves; and, however they might deem this a light matter, Christ assured them, that every idle or useless word, which in no way tended to their own comfort or benefit, or that of others, or to the glory of God, (the great ends for which man is endued with the gift of speech;) much more all pernicious, polluting, and impious words, must be "given an account of at the day of judgment:" and at that solemn season, they will be deemed decisive evidences of a man's character, and the state of his heart; according to which a person professing religion will be justified as a true believer, or condemned as a hypocrite; and all men will be adjudged pious or impious, holy or unholy, as their habitual conversation has been. V. 38—40. The scribes and Pharisees, persisting in their enmity, were dissatisfied with the evidences of our Lord's divine mission, arising from his miracles and the fulfilment of prophecy in him: and they desired a sign from heaven; perhaps meaning some such tremendous displays of the divine glory, as their fathers had seen on mount Sinai; or somewhat like that which took place when, at the word of Joshua, "the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." Josh. 10:12—14.—'None of them can say, I command that a fire shall come down from heaven; none of them can say, I command the sun to stand still.' R. Crooll. To this our Lord answered, that they were a wicked and adulterous generation of Israel, unfaithful to their covenant with God: and, hating the truth, they purposed to cloak their enmity under this unreasonable and presumptuous request: but that no sign should be given them, except that of Jonah; who, having remained three days in the whale's belly, was brought forth alive by the power of God, to preach to the Ninevites. In like manner, He, the Son of man, having been slain, and buried in a sepulchre hewn out of a rock, and covered with a great stone, as if in the heart of the earth, would be brought forth alive after three days, or on the third day: (Note, 1 Sam. 30:11—15.) for so the phrase here used signifies, according to the manner of speaking in use among the Jews. Then he would be proved to be alive by many infallible demonstrations; and those who did not receive him for the Messiah, would be left to final unbelief and destruction.—'It is a received rule among the Jews, that a part of a day is put for the whole; so that whatsoever is done in any part of the day, is properly said to be done that day. .·. (1 Kings 20:29. Esth. 4:16. 5:1.) . . . "When eight days were accomplished for the circumcision of the child, &c." . . . yet the day of his birth and of his circumcision were two of these eight days. .. Since then our Saviour was in the grave all Friday night and Saturday; seeing he was in the grave all Saturday night, and part of the morning of the day following, . . . he may, according to the Hebrew computation, be truly said to have been "three days and three nights in the heart of the earth."' Whitby. (Note, Eph. 4:7—10.)

V. 41, 42. The Ninevites had repented at the preaching of Jonah, though he wrought no miracles, and though his conduct in many things tended to prejudice them; and he gave them little instruction, or encouragement to repent. They would, therefore, rise up in judgment with that generation of Israel to whom Christ came, and condemn them: their repentance in such unfavourable circumstances would expose the aggravated guilt of the Jews, in continuing impenitent amidst all the miracles, instructions, warnings, and invitations of Christ, attended by his most holy example: for it was most evident, that a far more eminent and excellent person than Jonah was in the midst of them. (Notes, 11:20—24. Jon. 4:1—4.)—In like manner the queen of Sheba would appear against them, to their deeper condemnation; for she came from a remote region to learn heavenly wisdom from Solomon; whereas they had a far greater and a more excellent person in the midst of them, than even Solomon was. (Notes, 1 Kings 10:1—9.) He likewise went from place to place to instruct them, without their own labour or expense: yet they rejected him, and sinned in contempt of his instructions!—There is vast dignity and propriety in this declaration of Christ concerning himself, when we consider him as the incarnate Son of God; but on the supposition that he was a mere man, the words must impress the mind in a very different manner. (Marg. Ref.)—'God . . . having promised to Solomon such wisdom, that, as there was none like him before, . . . so should there after arise none like unto him; (1 Kings 3:12.) he that was greater in wisdom than Solomon, must be more than a man.' Whitby.

V. 43—45. Our Lord next describes the danger of the unbelieving Jews, under a parable, formed on the case of a demoniac. He supposes the evil spirit, (called unclean, because all sin is uncleanness in the judgment of a holy God,) voluntarily ceasing to possess one, who had been thus in his power; and this, lest he should be violently expelled. Yet he does it greatly against his will: and, as he cannot obtain permission to possess any other person, he wanders about disconsolate, in dry or desert places, "seeking rest and finding none." At length therefore he attempts to recover possession of him from whom he had departed: and on his return, he finds his former dwelling empty, (without any possessor to oppose his entrance,) "swept and garnished," or ready prepared for his reception. On this discovery he goes, and fetches seven, or several other, evil spirits, more malignant than himself, (for it seems, that even some demons are more wicked than others,) and they take up their abode in the man, and the possession becomes more dreadful and incurable than ever. Thus our Lord declared it would be with that generation. The powers of darkness, disturbed by the doctrine and miracles of Christ and his apostles, as well as by the ministry of John the Baptist, would for a time recede from the Jews, and seek rest among the Gentiles, in those dry lands where no water of life had hitherto been found. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Ps. 63:1—4, v. 1.) But, being pursued by the faithful and successful preaching of the gospel, and finding no rest there, they would return to repossess that unbelieving generation of Jews: and meeting with no opposition, other evil spirits, more numerous and more malignant than formerly, would take possession of them, and they would become more hardened, than before the preaching of "the kingdom of heaven" among them. In this view the parable is a prophecy of the rejection of the Jews, and their awful state of enmity to the gospel to this day.—But it is also applicable to the case of individuals, who hear the word of God, are convinced of its truth, and in part reformed, but not truly converted: the unclean spirit indeed retires, but Christ is not welcomed to "dwell in the heart by faith." The evil spirit hankers after his old abode, and waits his opportunity of returning: on examination, he finds his habitation empty, swept from convictions and serious impressions; and garnished or ready furnished, for the reception and entertainment of unclean spirits, by a preparation of heart to comply with their suggestions. Thus, instead of one evil spirit, seven take up their abode in the man, and "his last state becomes worse

45 Then goeth he, and taketh with himself [t]seven other spirits [u]more wicked than himself; and they enter in and dwell there: [x]and the last state of that man is worse than the first. [y]Even so shall it be also unto this wicked generation.

46 ¶ While he [z]yet talked to the people, behold, his mother and [a]his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him.

47 Then one said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee.

48 But he answered and said unto him that told him, [b]Who is my mother? and who are my brethren?

49 And he stretched forth his hand towards [c]his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren!

V. 46—50. It appears from the other Evangelists, that the earnestness and assiduity of Jesus, in teaching the people, notwithstanding the opposition of the Pharisees, gave disquietude to his friends and brethren, or near relations, (perhaps the children of Joseph by a former wife, or his cousins;) some of whom did not believe in him. (Marg. Ref. a.) They wanted him to desist, supposing that he exceeded all the bounds of prudence: and they seem to have engaged Mary to concur in the design; which was doubtless reprehensible, as it implied sentiments of him derogatory to his perfect wisdom and excellence. (Notes, Mark 3:20,21,31—35. Luke 8: 19—21.) They therefore came when he was teaching the people; and, not being able to approach him for the multitude, they sent to desire to speak with him. But Jesus, aware of their intention, answered by inquiring, who his mother and brethren were: intimating, that even they had no right to interfere, nor any authority over him in respect of his important work; that his spiritual affection to his disciples was greater than any natural affection which he bare to his relations; that his love to men's souls had the greatest influence over him; that even his mother was nearer to him as a true believer, than on account of her natural relation; and that his brethren would have no advantage from him, if they were not also believers. He therefore stretched forth his hands over his disciples, as expressing his cordial and endeared affection for them: and he declared that they were his mother and his brethren; that he bare them all the regard due to those near relations; and that he would honour and provide for them, even as a dutiful son would behave towards his beloved parent; or a man, when advanced to superior circumstances, would, if he acted properly, do to his poorer brother. Not only would he admit those present to those high and valuable privileges; but whosoever, of any age or nation, should do the will of his heavenly Father, by hearing, believing, and obeying him as his Saviour, he would in life, death, judgment, and for ever, be honoured and blessed; even as the brother, sister, or mother of him, who is "the Lord of all," and "the King of glory." (Notes, 7:21—23. John 19:25—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. They who follow Christ must be ready, when called to it, to endure hunger or submit to mean fare; and to be reproached, and falsely accused, for their close attendance on him and his ordinances: but they should leave the Lord to plead in their behalf, and he will do it effectually.—Such professed Christians, as are most destitute of the power of godliness, are often most tenacious of forms even to a scrupulous minuteness; especially when they can make use of them to support their credit or authority, to cloak their iniquity, or to oppose the upright servants of the Lord. Many of this description seem never to have read the Scriptures: for they severely censure, in living disciples, the very things for which holy men of old were not blamed: and at the same time they profess to hold the latter in high estimation; because they have the sanction of general opinion, are no longer the subjects of envy or competition, and give them no opposition or uneasiness in their ungodly practices. They will also condemn those things in persons of another party, which they overlook or excuse in those of their own.—Whilst "the Lord of the sabbath," who is far greater than the temple, and all external institutions, authorizes those labours on his holy day, which are necessary and conducive to the real good of ourselves or others, or subservient to piety and charity, he doubtless most strictly binds us from all other secular employments. The exercise of mercy, rather than sacrifice, allows us on some occasions to omit attendance on public ordinances, and to make needful provision for our health and food: yet surely when domestics are confined at home, and families rendered a scene of hurry and confusion "on the Lord's day," in order to furnish a feast for visitants, who can then spare their time more conveniently than on other days, for social indulgence, the case is very different! In censuring things of this kind, we need not fear "condemning the guiltless."—They who are unable to labour for their bread, are sometimes capable of attending on the ordinances of God: and in this way, they may expect comfort under their calamities, or deliverance from them. But alas! there are numbers, who frequent places of worship in order to start objections, or to find matter of accusation against the servants of God; and many a good question is proposed from very base motives. We cannot, like our Lord, discern the thoughts of such objectors: yet we must go on with our duty; endeavouring by meekness, benevolence, an irreproachable conduct, and unanswerable arguments, to obviate or silence their malicious insinuations.—Men will do more to save a trifle of their own property, than to relieve their neighbours: and some will even refuse to infringe the rest of the Lord's day, by visiting the afflicted, who would not decline labour if they were likely to lose the lives of their cattle! "The Lord's day," however, is especially the time for healing the souls of men: and whilst the helpless sinner hears the voice of Christ, and endeavours to obey it, he feels and manifests, that he has received power to do those things, of which before he was utterly incapable; and becomes, by his holy example, a witness of the Saviour's power and love, and of the blessed effects of his gospel.

V. 14—21. The more abundant good is done by the gospel, the greater opposition proud Pharisees and enemies will excite against it: and the more clearly it is proved to be from God, the more determined will be their malice, if left to themselves; for their sinful dispositions and practices, and their worldly credit and interests are all at stake. We should not, however, needlessly exasperate them; but should give place as far as it is consistent with continued endeavours to do good. Whilst we take encouragement, from the condescending mildness of our gracious Lord, the chosen Servant and well-beloved Son of the Father, in all our weakness, and amidst our manifold corruptions and temptations; we should also pray, that his "Spirit may rest upon us," and enable us to copy his example; that we may avoid all severity, ostentation, and boasting; that we may "study to be quiet, and to mind our own business;" and be gentle to those that are bruised with afflictions and temptations, or whose feeble faith and hope are like an expiring taper. Thus we should endeavour, as often as opportunity is given us, "to strengthen the hands that hang down, and to confirm the feeble knees;" and thus look to him, in behalf of ourselves and others, "to bring forth judgment unto victory;" expecting and earnestly praying also for the time, when all the Gentiles shall trust in his name, and wait for his law.

V. 22—30. In every way we see illustrations of the power and malice of our formidable enemies, and of the superior power and mercy of our great Deliverer. When he rescues the poor sinner from the oppression of the devil, the blind see the glory, and the dumb sing the praises, of our God. The changes effected by the power of divine grace form a continued proof, that Jesus is "the Son of David" and "the Son of God," and that "the gospel is the power of God unto salvation." This should induce all men to submit to Christ: but it has a contrary effect on many, even among professed Christians, who dare to ascribe the evident effects of divine power and holiness to the vilest motives, to enthusiasm, or even diabolical delusion! He who knows men's thoughts has taught us how to answer such objections: for the evident tendency and effects of the gospel are such, that if Satan could possibly patronize it, he must subvert his own kingdom. In this respect, the enemies of all good might teach Christians a useful lesson; for they exhibit to them an instructive example: hateful and hating as they are, they are too subtle to divide against themselves, so as to subvert their own kingdom; but whilst they agree together in malice, they tempt Christians to divide into parties, and to quarrel with each other, to the irreparable injury of the common cause!—But let us observe, that there are two grand interests in the world; all that side with Christ, against the kingdom of Satan, are his friends, but none else: and when unclean spirits are cast out by the Spirit of God, in the conversion of sinners to a life of faith and obedience, "the kingdom of God is come unto us." For these powerful enemies, like strong men, possess the sinner's heart, armed with his lusts, errors, and prejudices, and all his

THE same day went Jesus out of the house, and [a]sat by the sea-side.

2 And [b]great multitudes were gathered together unto him, [c]so that he went into a ship, and sat; and the whole multitude stood on the shore.

3 And he spake many things unto them [d]in parables, saying, Behold, [e]a sower went forth to sow:

4 And when he sowed, some seeds fell by [f]the way-side, and the fowls came and devoured them up:

5 Some fell upon [g]stony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they sprang up, because they had no deepness of earth:

6 And [h]when the sun was up, they were scorched; and, [i]because they had no root, they withered away.

7 And some fell [k]among thorns; and the thorns sprang up and choked them.

8 But other fell into [l]good ground, and brought forth fruit, [m]some an hundred-fold, some sixty fold, some thirty-fold.

faculties and abilities: nor could they be expelled, did not One come upon them with superior power, who is able to bind them at his will, take away from them their usurped possessions, and employ the convert, with all his talents, in his service and to his glory. All they, who refuse to concur, or do not rejoice, in such a revolution as this, are against Christ; and "he that gathereth not with him scattereth." Alas! what pains do many take in thus scattering abroad, and in ruining themselves and others, by promoting systems of human invention in opposition to the gospel of God our Saviour!

V. 31—37. In various ways, men sin against the clearest evidence of truth, and even against their own consciences; till, by resisting the Holy Ghost, they provoke God to give them up to final obduracy and impenitence.—Let all then be afraid of every approach to this fatal conduct: let sinners regard the voice of the Lord without delay, lest he should "swear in his wrath, that they shall never enter into his rest:" yet, let no trembling penitent yield to Satan's suggestions, to suppose, that the sinful words and works of the days of his ignorance, which he now recollects with shame and contrition, or any of his sins when first brought under convictions, were of this malignant nature. "All manner of sin and blasphemy" shall certainly be forgiven to the true believer; and "him that cometh to Christ, He will in no wise cast out." Indeed we might any of us have been left under condemnation, and the power of sin: but if "God hath given us repentance to the acknowledging of his truth," we are evidently escaped "from this snare of the devil," and should not yield to discouraging fears.—It is vain, however, for men to think that the tree is made good, when the fruit is evidently evil; or to expect good fruit from an evil tree: we should therefore daily seek to have our hearts cleansed by divine grace, and stored with the good treasure of divine truth and holy affections; that whilst numbers are corrupting, deceiving, or injuring others, with the evil things which they speak; we may be enabled continually to bring forth seasonable, pious, and edifying discourse from the abundance of our hearts. We shall consider this as a matter of great importance; for our Judge has declared, that men shall give an account of every idle word at the last day. If there were nothing else to be, at that awful season, produced against us, this alone would suffice to leave us without excuse. We ought then continually to examine ourselves, and seek forgiveness for the past; and keep a constant watch over ourselves, and bridle our tongues, and improve the gift of speech, as a most important talent, that we may for the future habitually speak such words, and such alone, as consist with the Christian character, are suited to "minister grace unto the hearers," and may be produced as proofs of our faith and love in the day of judgment.

V. 38—50. Men are more disposed to dictate to the Lord, and to demand those kinds and degrees of evidence, which he sees proper not to give, than to obey his call to "repent, and do works meet for repentance." The Ninevites therefore, and many from the remotest regions of the earth, who, by some faint report of the gospel, have been led to inquire after Christ and his salvation, will rise up in judgment against unbelievers in this age and nation also, and condemn them. For one far more honourable and eminent in wisdom than Solomon, or than all the ancient and modern sages, yea, than all prophets and apostles, is in the midst of us, making all who come to him wise unto eternal salvation by his word and by his Holy Spirit. Let us then learn of him, and seek to have his kingdom set up in our hearts: then the enemy will no more be able to regain possession of us, however he may threaten or harass us.—But let none rely on convictions, or external reformation: for every heart indeed is the residence of unclean spirits; those excepted, which are become the temple of the Holy Spirit by faith in Jesus Christ. These enemies will therefore watch their opportunities, when convictions and terrors are vanished, and inclinations after former indulgences revived; and, finding no effectual opposition, they will re-enter, strengthen the garrison, and render the man more entirely their slave than ever. Such characters cannot but be noticed, with mingled grief and horror, by those who carefully observe the state of congregations, where the gospel is faithfully dispensed.—What encouragement does our Redeemer give us to follow him wholly, to attend on his instruction, to trust in his mercy, and, by obeying him, to do the will of God our Father! Earthly relatives often fail of the duties incumbent on them: but He is such a Relation and Friend as men would have been, had sin never entered; indeed far more desirable. Whatever there is peculiar in the affection or regard of the different endeared relations of life, all centres in the love of Christ to his true disciples; yea, to the poorest, weakest, and most sinful of them. Whatever credit, comfort, or advantage could be derived from a loving brother, father, husband, or son, who was advanced to the highest state of earthly dignity and authority; this, and far more, may we confidently expect from Christ, in life, death, judgment, and to eternity. Let us then cease from men, and cleave to him; let us look upon every Christian, even in the lowest condition of life, as the beloved brother, or sister, or honoured mother, of the Lord of glory; and let us love, respect, and be kind to them for his sake, and after his example, and count this our privilege and delight: remembering his words, "Forasmuch as ye did it to the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me." (Notes, 25:34—46. P. O. 31—46.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. It is evident that the events recorded in the latter part of the preceding chapter took place on the same day on which our Lord spake some of the parables contained in this: but Luke relates the concluding incident after the parable of the sower. (Notes, 12 46—50. Luke 8:4—21.)—When Jesus came to the sea-side, a very great number of people collected together. He therefore went into a fisher-boat, or little ship, close to the land, that he might be less incommoded, and better heard, by the people. 'If the shore were elevated, as it probably might be, and formed a kind of semicircular bay, the people might range themselves round it, and hear with great advantage.' Gilpin.

V. 3—8. (Note, Judg. 9:8—15.)—Parables are a kind of pictures of spiritual things which we are slow to understand, under the similitude of external objects with which we are more fully acquainted: so that, when we have got the key we perceive more of their nature by a single glance, than we could otherwise learn by laboured descriptions, or multiplied distinctions.—This parable of the sower seems to be a prophetical history of the effects produced by the gospel in all places to which it should be sent.—A husbandman is represented as sowing good seed; for every man sows that kind of grain which he hopes to reap. But as he sowed, part of the seed fell by the way-side, a road lying across the field: here the ground was trodden, and the seed left uncovered, and so the birds picked it up. Another part fell on ground where a rock was covered with a very shallow soil: this part of the seed being only just covered, soon sprung up, and looked very promising; but when the summer-sun, in its noon-day heat, shone full on it, the soil was dried up beneath the root, and so it was scorched and withered. Another portion fell on ground which had not been cleared from thorns and weeds: this sprang up, and grew till harvest; but the thorns and weeds smothered and choked it, so that it could not ear, or yield any increase. But the rest fell into good ground, fertile and well prepared by tillage and manure, and this produced an abundant increase; some of it yielded thirty times as much as was sown, some sixty, and some even a hundred times as much. (Note, Gen. 26:12.) This alone answered the sower's purpose, and recompensed his toil. (Notes, Mark 4:1—20. Luke 8:4—15.)

9 Who [n]hath ears to hear, let him hear.

10 ¶ And the disciples came, and said unto him, [o]Why speakest thou unto them in parables?

11 He answered and said unto them, [p]Because it is given unto you to know [q]the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given.

12 For [r]whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, [s]from him shall be taken away even that he hath.

13 Therefore speak I to them in parables: [t]because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand.

14 And in them is fulfilled [u]the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive.

15 For this people's [x]heart is waxed gross, and their [y]ears are dull of hearing, and [z]their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, [a]and should be converted, [b]and I should heal them.

16 But [c]blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear.

17 For verily I say unto you, [d]That many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them. [Practical Observations.]

V. 9. (Note, 11:13—15.) This address was suited to call the attention of all present to the parable; and to show them, that some peculiarly interesting instruction was intended by it.

V. 10, 11. The multitudes, who heard this parable delivered in public, did not understand it, and probably few at that time inquired further about it. But the disciples, after the assembled company had been dismissed, came to our Lord in private, desiring to be informed why he thus taught the people, and what was the meaning of the parable. He had doubtless several reasons for adopting this method of instruction, which is peculiarly suited to assist the memory, and engage the attention; and which communicates information and conviction to the teachable in the most simple and compendious way. (Notes, Prov. 1:1—6.) 'Hereby it was visible who were ... "the sons of wisdom," who had a cordial love to divine things, and an inflamed desire after them; and thought it worthy of their care and pains to search them out, and so were persons fitly qualified for the reception of gospel light. It was the custom of the disciples of the Jewish doctors, when they understood not the meaning of their parables, to go unto their Rabbies to inquire the meaning of them; as did our Lord's disciples ask of him. ... And this Christ's hearers might have done, had they not been indisposed to receive the doctrine which he taught, and chosen rather to be held in error by the scribes and Pharisees.... Such lessons ... are best remembered; ... for the time spent in unfolding them, makes the idea more fixed and lasting.' Whitby.—'This happened after Christ had upbraided and threatened the neighbouring places, from whence doubtless the greatest part of the multitude came: (11:20—24.) and it is not improbable, that the ... Pharisees, who had so vilely blasphemed him this very morning, might with an ill purpose have gathered a company of their associates ... about Christ to ensnare him.' Doddridge.—The reason, however, which our Lord here assigned, is replete with instruction, warning, and encouragement. "It was given to" the disciples "to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but not to others;" that is, not at that time, for it might afterward be given to them also.—A mystery, in the scriptural use of the term, signifies a subject in religion, of which we can know little or nothing, except by revelation, and nothing more than is revealed. This knowledge is received by faith only, and must be used as a principle in all our other reasonings; but itself must not be disputed, as if it were the subject of reason and argument. There are many mysteries respecting the kingdom of heaven; and it is given to Christ's true disciples to know or understand them, as far as it is needful; and to them alone. Those who in humble faith take him for their Teacher, by attending to the instructions of his word, and seeking the teaching of his Spirit, attain to this knowledge; but the proud, unteachable, and unbelieving do not: for no man can know them, except from the great Prophet of the church.—But his special choice and effectual calling made those persons his disciples, rather than others of their countrymen, and this brought them to learn of him.

Mysteries. (11) Μυστηρια. ('Alii ab Hebraico מסתר res abscondita deducunt; alii vero Græco μυειν claudere; occludere, abscondere, aut μυεσθαι sacris initiari, originem debere existimant.' Schleusner.) Rom. 11:25. 16:25. 1 Cor. 13:2. Eph. 1:9. 3:3,4,9. 1 Tim. 3:9,16.

V. 12. It is an invariable rule in the kingdom of Christ, that "whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance:" that is, say many expositors, 'he who improves what he has.' Yet if our Lord meant so, why did he not thus express himself, either here or in other places? (Marg. Ref. r, s.) There is no doubt a truth in this way of stating it; for no man improves either natural powers, or external advantages, without the special grace of God: yet it is a truth often misunderstood and perverted. The obvious meaning is, that one of the special gifts of God to his people is an earnest of others: so that he who has faith and grace, shall receive further communications of knowledge, wisdom, holiness, and every blessing of salvation, till he has a great abundance; whereas he, who has not faith and grace, shall at last be deprived of all his other attainments and advantages, in which he trusted and gloried. The plain inferences from which are, that he who desires these blessings must seek them from Christ, or he never can have them: and he that has received them, must bless the Lord for making him to differ, and trust him to perfect his own good work. (Notes, Mark 4:23—25. Luke 8:16—18.)—'Whosoever, through my goodness and mercy, hath any measure of grace wrought in him; that man, in the effectual use of those means which I afford him, shall have yet more: but whosoever hardeneth his heart to refuse those gracious offers, which are made to him, it is and shall be just with God, to take away from him those gracious offers, which are made to him; it is and shall be just with God, to take away from him those helps, and tenders of means, and previous dispensations, which are made to him.' Bp. Hall.

V. 13. Our Lord spake in parables to the people, because they refused to improve their faculties and advantages: for they hated the truth through love of sin, and closed their eyes to the light by proud and carnal prejudices. They saw his miracles, but could not see that he was the Messiah; and heard his doctrine, without acknowledging that it was the voice of God: and it was his sovereign will to leave many of them to final obduracy and unbelief. (Notes, 16,17. Deut. 29: 4. Is. 42:18—20.)

V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.) The prophecy referred to seems to have had a peculiar respect to the times and persons here spoken of. (Note, Is. 6:9,10.) They would have the fullest opportunity of learning the way of salvation; yet they should not understand it, nor perceive in Jesus the fulfilment of the ancient prophecies. Because their hearts were become gross, or fat, (that is, stupid and insensible,) through pride, avarice, hypocrisy, and unbelief; so that their ears were stopped against the report of the gospel, and they purposely closed their eyes against the light because they hated it: (Note, John 3:19—21.) and therefore God judicially left them to be blinded; so that it became impossible for them to understand or believe the doctrine of salvation, or to be converted, that their souls might be healed: for had they been converted, they must have been pardoned and healed; or, saved and renewed unto holiness.—There seems throughout to be a special reference to the malevolent Pharisees and their adherents. (Notes, 12:22—45.) 'The prophets are in other places said to perform the thing which they only foretel.' Bp. Lowth.—'That we might not suspect this grossness of heart and heaviness of ears was the effect of nature, and not of choice; he subjoins the fault of the will, "their eyes have they closed."' Jerome.

By hearing, &c. (14) The quotation is made almost exactly in the words of the LXX. The meaning is, indeed, the same with the Hebrew, as to the substance: but both the evangelist and the Septuagint render that, as relating the fact, which the Hebrew gives imperatively, "Make this people's heart fat," &c. It is observable, that the passage is not once quoted imperatively in the New Testament.—In John it is quoted, "He hath blinded, &c." In Romans, "God hath given them, &c." employed in a proper and profitable manner, and further light and instruction would continually be added. Their advantages also were peculiarly valuable: for "many prophets and righteous persons," from the beginning of the world, had desired to see the times in which they lived, and the miracles which they witnessed, and to hear the Messiah's instructions which they daily heard; yet they were not allowed to possess these desired privileges. They looked forward to the Redeemer, who was in due time to appear, and rested their hopes on him: they had their light from this Sun, before he arose above the horison; and they longed to see him already risen: but this was reserved as a peculiar blessing for the apostles, whose light was proportionably more distinct and clear. (Notes, Luke 10:23,24. Heb. 11:13—16,39,40. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)

V. 18, 19. After this encouraging and instructive introduction, our Lord proceeded to expound the parable to his disciples. "The Sower" represented the Saviour himself, in his personal ministry, or as speaking by his apostles and faithful ministers. The seed sown is "the word of the kingdom," "the word of God." Every kind of preaching is by no means sowing this seed: if men teach mere morality, metaphysical speculations, enthusiastical delusions, human traditions, false doctrines; as the seed is congenial to the soil of fallen human nature, an increase may be expected. But it must be of the same kind with the seed: for the good fruit of repentance, faith, piety, and holiness can be produced from "the word of the kingdom" alone. This word, by those discoveries which it makes to us of God and ourselves, of sin and holiness, of Christ and eternity, is as properly in the heart, a seed of all true godliness, as the grain of wheat is, in the fruitful soil, of the future crop of wheat. But as the earth must be prepared to receive the seed, by a principle of fertility, and by proper culture; so the heart must be suitably disposed, or the word of God will not yield any increase. Many hearers of the gospel, where most scripturally preached, are like "the way-side:" their hearts are no more suited to the holy word of God, than the high road, continually beaten by passengers, would be to receive the seed-corn. They are worldly, proud, prejudiced, and careless: they hear, but understand not, as they have no desire to understand. They attend from curiosity, or custom, or worse motives, out of the midst of secular engagements and conversation; whilst the word is sounding in their ears, they are often employed in thoughts about their diversions, pursuits, or schemes, the persons and objects around them, or the appointments which are to succeed the tedious hour: or they come in order to object, deride, or revile; but without expectation or desire of profiting. They therefore understand nothing of the true meaning, excellence, or importance of what they hear: and those evil spirits, who are sure to form an attentive part of every congregation, where the gospel is truly preached, (having more employment there, and being more in danger of losing their servants, than at the places of dissipation or debauchery,) are ready immediately to catch away the word out of the mind of such hearers, by suggesting more pleasing ideas, by engaging them in vain speculations or frivolous conversation, or by exciting pride and evil passions; or to excite disgust at the plain truths of God's word, or against something in the style and manner of the preacher. Thus the best sermons make no impression and produce no effect; such hearers are neither convinced, nor informed, but remain as ignorant, infidel, careless, profligate, and ungodly as before. 'This industry of Satan to snatch the word out of our hearts, as it discovers his enmity against the progress of the gospel, so doth it highly commend the excellence and efficacy of it: for were it not of great importance to preserve it there, he would not be so industrious to snatch it thence; and were it not, when there, a powerful instrument to work within us that "faith which purifies the heart;" why doth he do this, lest we should believe? Why is it then that men do call this quick and powerful word, this word of life, a dead letter? And when they daily by experience see, that the persuasions of themselves and others are often prevalent, why do they think that God's can be of no effect, without a miracle?' Whitby.—No man can persuade another to that which his heart is totally set against: and before regeneration, the heart is totally set against the gospel. If regeneration be called a miracle in the concluding clause; our Lord's words answer the question, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." But if the learned writer meant something else than regeneration, let those who expect miracles answer him.—The quotation, this excepted, which seemed to require notice, is of great importance.

The wicked one. (19) Ὁ πονηρος.—Ὁ Σατανας, Mark 4:15. Ὁ διαβολος, Luke 8:12. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:3,4.)

V. 20, 21. Other hearers of the gospel resemble the "stony places." They are instructed concerning salvation by grace, through faith, the privileges of the believer, and the felicity of heaven: and without humiliation or change of heart, without abiding conviction of their own guilt and depravity, the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, their need of a Saviour, or the excellence of holiness, they eagerly endeavour to appropriate the comforts of the gospel; they take up a superficial view of religion, and become confident that all the blessings of which they hear belong to them. This delusion fills them with unsanctified joy, and excites other high and false affections: but they do not manifest godly sorrow, brokenness of heart, tenderness of conscience, or consistency of conduct. There is, however, in these professors of the gospel great appearance of zeal and earnestness, and many pious persons think highly of them; which tends still more to enhance their joy and confidence. Thus they seem to make more progress than the humble, contrite, and conscientious Christian; and often exceed him in fluency and forwardness of speech, and in boldness for the truth, when in no immediate danger. Yet their hearts are proud and worldly: they therefore "endure for a while;" even so long as their profession conduces to procure them consideration and advantage, or, at least, does not materially interfere with their secular interests, or require peculiar self denial. But "when persecution or tribulation," for the sake of the word, arises; like a scorching sun, it destroys the root of their religion, and then the blade withers. Some heavy trial must be sustained if they cleave to the Lord, or some advantage may be had by forsaking him; or they are proved by circumstances of peculiar temptation: and, having "no root in themselves," not being rooted and grounded in the love of Christ, as the only and most precious Saviour of perishing sinners, they are not willing to forsake all, and bear their cross for him. Thus "they are offended," and stumble; they find some pretence for renouncing or disguising their profession, or they turn aside to a more lax and easy religion, according to which they can 'serve God and Mammon." Many such hearers are doubtless found in every congregation, and in these easy days some of them may continue for a long time: but should persecution arise, they would drop off, as the leaves from the trees in autumn.—'He receives the word with joy, and is much affected with it, though afterwards he is offended at it: whence also it appears, that it is not enough to render us good Christians, that we at present are somewhat affected with the word, and receive it with some ... delight, ... unless it doth produce sincerity and constancy in our obedience to all its precepts, even those which are most grievous to flesh and blood.' Whitby.—'The sowing of the seed on the stony ground denoteth him, that at the first hearing, receives the gospel with all greediness and joy; looking on the smoother part of it; but for want of an honest heart, a good soil where it may take root, ... they last but a little while.' Hammond.

V. 22. Another set of hearers resemble ground overrun with thorns or noxious weeds. They receive the word into a heart crowded with anxious cares, or covetous desires: they are alarmed, and then quieted; they acquire knowledge, have thoughtful seasons, purpose to be Christians, perhaps assent to an orthodox creed, and make a plausible profession of religion; and continue even to the end to impose on themselves and others. But they aim to serve two masters: their great concern is about the world; they eagerly pursue riches, are solicitous to obtain a competency, to advance their families, and to make a reputable figure among their neighbours. If in lower circumstances, their chief care is about a present and future provision for themselves and their families. Or perhaps being of another turn of mind, the pleasures of the world, and the desire of pomp, luxury, or authority, predominate; while religion is only a secondary concern to quiet conscience, to exclude the fear of hell, to keep up the hope of heaven, or to maintain the good opinion of Christians and ministers; whose approbation, or tacit connivance, often confirms them in this delusion. In this soil the seed seems to grow; but it is smothered by "the cares of this world and the

of this world, and [s]the deceitfulness of riches, [t]choke the word, and he becometh unfruitful.

23 But he [u]that received seed into the [x]good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it, which also [y]beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, [z]some an hundred-fold, some sixty, some thirty. [Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ Another parable [a]put he forth unto them, saying, [b]The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed [c]good seed in his field:

25 But while [d]men slept, his [e]enemy came and sowed [f]tares among the wheat, and went his way.

26 But [g]when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also.

27 So [h]the servants of the householder came, and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? from [i]whence then hath it tares?

28 He said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, [k]Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up?

29 But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them.

30 Let [l]both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say [m]to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, [n]and bind them in bundles to [o]burn them; [p]but gather the wheat into my barn. [Practical Observations.]

31 ¶ Another parable [q]put he forth unto them, saying, [r]The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard-seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field;

32 Which indeed is [s]the least of all seeds: but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree; [t]so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.

deceitfulness of riches:" for wealth seems to promise many advantages; and men of some seriousness often pursue it, under the self-flattering idea, that they shall by means of it be enabled to do the more good; and in both respects they find in the event, that they have been deceived. The love of riches imposes on their judgments, and deludes them into multiplied methods of increasing them, some of which are fraudulent; it induces them to procrastinate their intended earnestness about religion; and allures them into endless incumbrances, infectious connexions, sinful compliances, and conformity to the world. These are the thorns which grow up and choke the word; so that it becomes unfruitful, or brings nothing to perfection. (Notes, 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 8—10,17,18.)—This is the most unsuspected and fatal danger in great commercial cities, and in times of outward peace and prosperity; and it is to be feared that very many are thus deceived, and lose their own souls, in attempting to gain more of this present world.

V. 23. Though so much of this precious seed seems thrown away, yet it will not all "return void," or fail to "prosper in that for which it is sent." (Note, Is. 55:10,11.) Some of it falls on good ground, even in an "honest and good heart," sincerely desirous of learning the truth and will of God, in order to believe and obey them. This "preparation of heart is from the LORD;" and the want of the honest and good heart is the only reason why the gospel occasions the condemnation of any who hear it. When the heart is influenced by the fear of God, and a desire of his favour; when it is humble and contrite; when forgiveness and grace are valued more than worldly objects; when sin is hated and dreaded, and deliverance from it earnestly desired; when a man is thus disposed to "buy the truth" at any price, and to become Christ's disciples at all adventures; then the ground is prepared for the good seed, and nothing can prevent its growth and increase. He, whose heart is thus prepared, will hear the word of God with earnest prayer to be taught by the Holy Spirit, and to be delivered from prejudice and error; he will receive it with reverence, humility, and docility; he will gradually understand more and more of its nature, excellency, authority, and tendency; he will receive it into a broken heart, by "faith working by love," and "overcoming the world;" and he will, as it were, cover it over by meditation and prayer. Satan can by no means take it out of this man's heart: when it springs up, it will strike deep root, so that persecutions and afflictions, which scorch and wither the seed sown upon the rock, will serve to ripen this for the harvest: the cares, interests, and pleasures of the world will be subordinated and moderated with reference to the welfare of the soul: and when they seem ready to injure the believer, or to mar his fruitfulness, he will bestow pains to root them up, as thorns and weeds, lest they should deprive him of his expected increase. Thus the seed will produce a plenteous crop, and he, in whose heart it grows, will "bring forth fruit with patience," and perseverance in well-doing even to the end. All who thus receive the good seed, will manifest their holiness of heart by holy actions; their piety, justice, truth, goodness, mercy, temperance, and meekness, will glorify God, adorn the gospel, and do substantial benefit to mankind. They will not all be alike fruitful: but all will yield a rich increase of those "fruits of the Spirit," which are the effects and evidence of true repentance and faith in Christ. These alone are valued by the Sower of the seed, and the Giver of the increase.—In all congregations, where the true word of God has been preached hitherto, there have been these four sorts of hearers; and no others are conceivable. So that we may consider the parable as a remarkable prophecy, the accomplishment of which continually proves the truth of the sacred Scripture.

V. 24—30. The kingdom of heaven, or the gospel-dispensation, resembled also a man that sowed good seed in his field. But whilst his servants, who were set to watch the field, were asleep, an enemy came privily, sowed seed of another nature, and then went away. When, however, the seed had grown so much as to approach maturity, it was plain that there were tares among the wheat. It is not certainly known what is meant by the word rendered tares; but it is evident, that the pulse at present called tares, or vetches, was not intended: otherwise the tares might early and certainly have been known, and eradicated without danger; and if permitted to grow till harvest, they would have been too valuable to be burnt. Some useless, noxious weed must therefore be signified, which could not so easily be distinguished from the blade of the wheat.—When, however, the servants expressed their concern and surprise that the crop should thus be marred, they were told that "an enemy had done this." Nor would their Lord permit them to pull them up, lest through error or inadvertency they should root up the wheat also. Though injurious to the crop, it was best that both should grow together till the harvest; and then he would give previous orders to the reapers to separate the tares, and bind them in bundles for fuel, as well as to take care of the wheat. (Note, 36—43.)

Tares. (25) Ζιζανια. 'A kind of bad and hurtful plant, which spoiled the corn in Palestine, and is unknown in these days.' Quot. in Leigh.—' A kind of plant very well known in Palestine; the seed of which was not unlike wheat, and the plant growing from it had the same greenness and stalk as wheat; but it brought forth no fruit, or certainly not good fruit.' Schleusner.—It is used in this chapter only.—Was sprung up. (26) Εβλαστησε. Mark 4:27. Heb. 9:4. Jam. 5:18.—Gen. 1:11. Num. 17:8. Sept.—Bundles. (30) Δεσμας. V. 31, 32. A grain of mustard-seed is one of the least seeds that men sow in the field: yet in deep and rich soils it will produce a plant of very great size; so large, that they who have not seen it, have seldom an adequate conception of the propriety of the similitude. ' There was a stalk of mustard-seed in Sichin, from which sprang out three boughs, of which one was broke off, and covered the tent of a potter, and produced three cabs of mustard.' R. Simeon.—' A stalk of mustard-seed was in my field, into which I was used to climb, as men do into a fig-tree.' R. Calipha in Whitby.—The author has seen plants of mustard, in the deep and rich soil of some low lands in Lincolnshire, larger than most shrubs, and almost like a small tree. Probably, in the eastern countries, it is the largest plant from the smallest seed, which has yet been noticed. This rendered it peculiarly fit to represent the gospel dispensation; which from very small beginnings, when its poor, unlearned, unarmed, and despised preachers had all the power, wealth, learning, wickedness, and false religion in the world against them, soon grew so large as to overspread whole nations, and to subvert the deep-rooted foundations of ancient idolatry, as well as to take the place of the Mosaic dispensation; and which ere long will fill the whole earth.—It also illustrates the effect of the gospel in any place, where it is fully and faithfully dispensed. It begins in "a day of small things:" but as one after another is converted, the examples, prayers, and endeavours of this company, render it prevalent, and it diffuses its influence all around. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Is. 9:6,7. Dan. 2:34,35,44,45. Luke 13:18—21.)

V. 33. (Luke 13:20,21.) Leaven is generally used in Scripture, as the emblem of corrupt doctrine, or wickedness; (Notes, 16:5—12. 1 Cor. 5:6—8. Gal. 5:7—12, v. 9.) yet here it represents the truth and grace of God. This circumstance should warn men not to overstrain the emblems and parables of Scripture, or apply them without careful discrimination.—Leaven has a peculiar taste, which it communicates by fermentation to the whole mass of moistened flour, however large it may be; provided it remain in it long enough to diffuse itself. Thus the word of God, when received into the heart by the teaching of the Holy Spirit, gradually changes the judgment, affections, conduct, and conversation. Though these were before carnal, sensual, proud, selfish, envious, and ungodly; they now receive a heavenly savour: the thoughts, desires, pursuits, and discourse gradually become humble, and holy, and spiritual; the Christian learns to attend to his worldly affairs, possessions, comforts, and relative duties after a heavenly manner; and this change is progressive, till perfected in heaven.—The former parable represents the kingdom of heaven as set up in the world, this shows us the nature of it as it is set up in the heart.

V. 34,35. (Notes, Ps. 49:1—4. 78:2.) That, which the Psalmist spake of himself, when instructing the people under the influence of the Holy Spirit, was also fulfilled, when Christ taught the people by parables: for under these dark sayings he actually set before them, in the most effectual manner, those deep mysteries, which had been kept secret from the beginning; which neither prophets nor patriarchs had fully understood; and which many would afterwards remember to have heard from him, when the event had in part developed their meaning. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 36—43. After our Lord had spoken the preceding parables, he dismissed the multitude and retired into a house; where his disciples applied to him to explain the parable of the tares, as that seems most of all to have perplexed them. He therefore informed them, that "the Son of Man," the Messiah, was the Sower of the good seed; that is, personally, and by his ministers: and this implied also, that he is the Lord and Proprietor of the field. This represented "the world," throughout which the word of God was to be preached under the gospel. "The good seed," (or those converts produced from it,) is "the children of the kingdom," true believers, the loyal subjects of Christ, and heirs of heaven: but the produce of the bad seed are "the children of the wicked one;" heretics, hypocrites, antichristians, antinomians, and enthusiasts, of every description.—As the parable of the sower represents what is wrong in the visible church, (even where the true gospel is faithfully preached,) through the subtlety of Satan and the depravity of the human heart; so that of the tares represents the fatal effects of false teachers and doctrine, drawing men off from the truth, or prejudicing them against it.—The counterfeit characters, above mentioned, are the genuine produce of false doctrine and distorted views of Christianity, which "Satan, transformed into an angel of light," by his ministers of various descriptions, propagates in the world: even as true believers are the produce of the real gospel, attended by the influence of the Holy Spirit. The devil, the enemy of Christ and of men, sows this seed by his servants, in order to deceive souls, and disgrace the gospel; he does it "by night," and privily; he is most successful when least suspected, and when ministers and Christians are most unwatchful. (Notes, Acts 20:29—31. 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) The produce of this corrupt seed is not immediately discovered, but gradually detected. And though gross transgressors, and such as openly oppose the fundamentals of the gospel, ought to be separated from the society of the faithful; yet many of "the children of the kingdom" are so defective, and many of "the children of the wicked one" so plausible, that an exact discrimination cannot be made by human discernment; and by attempting too much, true believers may be rejected, stumbled, or discouraged. Much less must separation by persecution be attempted; by which far more of the wheat has been eradicated, than of the tares, in all cases, in which the officious servants, contrary to their Lord's express command, have employed that unhallowed means. In general they must be let alone till the harvest. This will be at "the end of the world;" for though death will separate them as to their souls, yet the grand and public separation will be at the day of judgment. Then the holy angels will be employed, as the reapers in this harvest, by the Son of Man, the incarnate Saviour and Judge, whose creatures, worshippers, and servants they are. These will gather together all the wicked, throughout the whole world; and especially all heretical and hypocritical professors of the gospel, who have caused scandals and wrought iniquity, from every part of the church, in order to their destruction; even as the tares are bound up in bundles to be burned: and they shall be cast into hell, as into a furnace of fire, where will be doleful lamentations and gnashing of teeth in rage and despair. When the tempters and tempted, the deceivers and the deceived, and those who have associated together, and encouraged each other in delusion and iniquity, shall be consigned to the same punishment, and, with desperate enmity, shall charge their destruction upon each other; then these tares will, as it were, "be bound in bundles to be burned." But at that time "the righteous," "the children of the kingdom," will shine forth in the image of Christ, with the lustre of the unclouded noon-day sun, "in the kingdom of their Father;" being made unspeakably glorious, excellent, wise, and happy.—These are truths universally interesting, and infinitely important: and every man in the world is concerned to attend to them, as he values the salvation of his soul.

V. 44. The nature of "the kingdom of heaven," as it is set up in the world and in the heart, and as it is counteracted by human depravity and by false doctrine, has been shown: here, its privileges and blessings, and the way in which we obtain admission into it, are illustrated. In this view, "the kingdom of heaven" is like an immense "treasure, concealed in a field." Many walk over this field, without knowing that it contains such a treasure: but when a man has been fully convinced of this, he conceals his discovery, in order that no one may prevent his intended acquisition; and, with great joy at the prospect of speedily being enriched, he goes and sells all his property, that he may purchase the field and every thing contained in it. This represents the invaluable blessings of the gospel, which suffice to render us rich and happy to all eternity: these are contained in the sacred Scriptures; yet multitudes have access to the sacred oracles, without being aware of the unsearchable riches which they contain. But when a man is brought to a proper sense of his own character, state, and wants, and becomes in earnest about eternal life; he begins to search the word of God with greater diligence and care; and thus discovering the treasure, he resolves at any rate to obtain it. His joy at this discovery is indeed moderated by fear of coming short, and he uses every precaution against it. He renounces all hopes, claims, pursuits, interests, or pleasures, which are incompatible with salvation. Nothing indeed can be given as the price of this salvation, yet much must be given up for the sake of it. This is implied by purchasing the field. The person, who is thus decided does not conclude that salvation belongs to him, because he has heard and assented to the gospel. He rejoices, that he has found such a treasure, even before he can call it his own; but he knows that he must go to the price of the whole religion of the Scriptures, and receive Christ, in all respects, if he would be saved and enriched by him.—Thus he enters the kingdom, and obtains possession of its privileges: and when he has purchased the field, and begins to examine the treasure; he finds it like a mine of gold, which is more and more rich, the longer it is wrought, and the more deeply it is penetrated. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Prov. 2:3—5. 23:23.)

V. 45, 46. This parable is nearly of the same import as the preceding: but the former represents all spiritual blessings, as they are communicated to us through the Scriptures; this exhibits them, as they are laid up in Christ, to whom the Scriptures direct us for them.—Every man is "a merchant seeking goodly pearls:" all men seek happiness, and each deems his favourite object a precious jewel. But when a convinced sinner discovers the glory and preciousness of Christ, as the all-gracious Saviour of the lost; he sees Him to be indeed "the Pearl of great price," and all things else comparatively worthless. Whatever it may cost him, he is determined to purchase this invaluable Pearl, which will surely enrich the possessor to all eternity: and if he obtain not this prize, he sees that eternal misery is his portion. He "therefore counts all things but loss and dung that he may win Christ;" and being determined rather to part with riches, reputation, liberty, or even life, than deny the Saviour; and giving up all other pleas and hopes, but those that arise from his person, undertaking, sufferings, and mediation; he obtains admission into the kingdom, and to the participation of all its blessings. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Eph. 3:8. Phil. 3:8—11.)

V. 47—50. This parable seems to comprise the meaning of the parables of the sower and the tares, under an allusion to those things, about which several of the apostles had been most conversant. The means used for replenishing the Messiah's kingdom, would resemble the casting of a large net into the sea, which being filled and drawn to shore, would be found to contain valuable fishes, and such as were worthless; either of a bad sort, or out of season, or dead and putrid. These the fishermen would at last separate, gathering the good into their vessels, and throwing the bad away. Thus multitudes profess Christianity, and worship in the visible church, as long as they live: but at the last, the angels of Christ executing his decisions, as Judge of the world, will make an exact discrimination between the good and the bad; gathering true believers into heaven, and casting worthless professors of the gospel, as well as other wicked men, into the place of final punishment.

V. 51, 52. Our Lord seems to have spoken these latter parables to his disciples, apart from the multitude; and he demanded of them whether they understood the things intended by them. To which they answered, (perhaps too confidently,) that they did: yet it is probable, that they had a general apprehension of his meaning, as there was no immediate reference to his sufferings and death; for it is evident, that they were far more ignorant and prejudiced in respect of his priestly office, than about any other subject. He therefore concluded the whole with another parable, immediately relating to their office in the church. The scribes were the teachers of the Jews at that time: and the apostles, and other ministers, were to be the teachers under the Christian dispensation. Every one of them, therefore, ought to be "a scribe well instructed" in all things pertaining to "the kingdom of heaven." This he represented to them under the similitude of a householder, who has a large family to provide for: such a one will take care to have a stock of provisions in hand for their supply, to which he will be adding continually what he judges to be needful or useful. Thus the people would depend on the apostles, and on other ministers of Christ, as "stewards of the mysteries of God," who were appointed to dispense to them the provision for their souls. They should therefore carefully treasure up, in their memory and heart, all that they had learned; and add to their fund of knowledge continually, deriving fresh instruction from all they heard, saw, or experienced. Then they would be able to bring forth old truth, with new observations, illustrations, and exhortations; and to lead the people forward in knowledge, as they made progress themselves. Some reference may also be had to the old and new dispensations.—'They ought to be diligent who have not only to be wise for themselves, but to dispense the wisdom of God to others.' Beza.

Instructed. (52) Μαθητευθεις· (α μαθητης, hocque a μανθανω:) 27:57. 28:19. Acts 14:21.

V. 53. (Mark 4:34,35.) St. Mark expressly fixes our Lord's crossing the sea of Tiberias to go over to the Gadarenes, to the evening of the day on which he spake the parable of the sower: so that, on finishing his parables, he sailed thither, and left the people to reflect on them.

V. 54—58. On another occasion, Jesus went to Nazareth, (called his own country, because he was there brought up,) and he taught in the synagogue; thus giving the inhabitants an additional opportunity of hearing his doctrine, and seeking the benefit of those miracles, concerning which they must have heard many surprising accounts. (Notes, Luke 4:16—30.) And indeed the authority and wisdom, with which he spake, astonished his former neighbours; and led them to inquire, where he had obtained this wisdom and miraculous power. But, as they were acquainted with his low parentage, education, and manner of life; and knew that he had neither been educated under the scribes, nor authorized by the chief priests; they perversely objected those things to him, which were in fact the most evident proofs that he was sent by God.—Probably, they did not know, that he was born at Bethlehem, and of the family of David.—By comparing several passages in the gospels, (Marg. Ref. y—a,) it appears that Mary, the wife of Cleophas, was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, and that James and Joses were her sons. According to the common way of speaking, being such near relations, they are called brethren, especially as they seem to have lived much together; and it is probable, that the others here mentioned that [x]they were astonished and said, Whence hath this man this wisdom, and these mighty works?

55 Is not this [y]the carpenter's son? [z]is not his mother called Mary? [a]and his brethren, James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas?

56 And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man all these things?

57 And [b]they were offended in him. But Jesus said unto them, [c]A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country, and in his own house.

58 And [d]he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief.

were either the children of Cleophas and Mary, or some others standing in the same near relation to our Lord. But some think that they were Joseph's children by a former wife. They were, however, well known at Nazareth, as persons in a low and poor condition, who were nearly related to Jesus; and this proved an occasion of stumbling to the proud and prejudiced inhabitants.—On this occasion our Lord observed, that "a prophet was not without honour, except in his own country, and among his own relations." Those, who have most known and conversed with the man, are least disposed to respect the prophet. He is thought to take too much upon him, in authoritatively addressing their consciences; they are displeased with his pretensions, and the credit which he acquires; and various circumstances of no importance, respecting his former occupations and appearance, recur to their memory, and prejudice them against all he says.—The unbelief of the Nazarenes, however, precluded them from sharing the benefit of our Lord's power and grace: few came to him for healing, and he did not think it consistent with his wisdom and dignity, to obtrude his miracles and presence upon them: so he retired, and left them to their prejudices; and, as far as we can find, he went among them no more. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. Our divine teacher orders every thing in that manner which best tends to the edification of the humble, teachable, and attentive disciple; but at the same time he leaves occasions of falling, in the way of the careless, the captious, the self-sufficient, and presumptuous.—We not only have his word to instruct us; but, when we meet with difficulties, we are allowed and required to call on him in private, for the teaching of his Holy Spirit: and to those, who thus wait on him, "it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven," which are concealed from all others under an impenetrable veil. We should therefore fear above all things an unteachable disposition, the result of ignorance, pride, and the carnal mind. To persons of this temper, the things of the Spirit of God appear foolishness; and by deriding, reviling, and opposing them, they provoke the Lord to leave them under the power of strong delusions, to their final perdition. Such men may have excellent abilities, and profound erudition, and many valuable advantages: but not having humble faith and love, all else will soon be taken from them, or turn to their unspeakable detriment. But the meanest and most illiterate believer is happy: his senses and faculties are blessed, they are employed to good purpose, and are "instruments of righteousness unto God." Under the Christian dispensation, we all enjoy that blessed light, and hear that joyful sound, which "prophets and righteous men" of old desired to see and hear, and were not able: and if we have grace to make a proper use of our advantages, more knowledge and wisdom will be given us, and we shall have abundance. But do any desire these blessings, who cannot ascertain that they have received them? Let them wait on the Lord for his teaching, and search the Scriptures with prayer: let them not close their own eyes and ears, and then God will not close them; and let them remember that the purposes and promises of God are perfectly consistent, and that "every one that asketh, receiveth." As for those who harden themselves against the truth, they can have no reason to complain, if God leave them to their perverse choice; till they be so blinded, that they can neither see, nor hear, nor be converted and healed.

V. 18—23. The good seed of divine truth should be sown in every part of the field, all over the world; though it can only bear fruit upon the good ground. But let all, who presume to preach, be careful to sow the "word of the kingdom," and to keep this good seed free from every intermixture: let them sow it liberally, and "be instant in season, out of season," "whether men will hear or forbear." For these things they are accountable; but not for success, except as they prevent it by their own misconduct: nor should they be surprised or discouraged, if many hear in vain, or to bad purpose: for this was the case, when our Lord himself condescended to preach the gospel.—We should, however, especially look to ourselves, that we may ascertain what sort of hearers we are. We ought to beg of God to prepare our hearts, as good ground; to teach us the value of his word; to deliver our minds from pride and prejudice; to preserve us from wandering thoughts and vain imaginations; and to impress us with a serious and earnest desire to learn of him all those things which pertain to salvation. For want of thus "giving earnest heed," many hearers of the pure gospel "receive the seed by the way-side:" thus Satan immediately catches it out of their hearts, and no good effect can follow. (Note, Heb. 2:1—4.) Though this may not be altogether the case with us, yet we should be humbled by the recollection, that it too often is, and has been so. It is the great object of our enemy to deprive us of the blessing, totally or in part; and it ought to be ours to disappoint him. Having therefore gone to hear the word, with a mind prepared by recollection and devotion; and having attended on it with serious and humble reverence; we should seek to preserve it in our hearts, by retirement, meditation, prayer, or pious conversation.—But there are more plausible paths to ruin, than those of the careless, the infidel, or the profligate: numbers of those, who are greatly affected, and who are led to make a high profession of the gospel, with much confidence, joy, and violent zeal, are found by the event to have "had no root in themselves:" for without deep humiliation, reverential fear of God, and a solemn sense of eternal things, the evil of sin, and the lost estate of our souls: high affections resemble the joy of a madman, who deems all the magnificent edifices which he sees to be his own. Nothing can so grow in an unhumbled heart, as to stand the noon-day sun of tribulation and persecution, in all their varied forms: many, when thus tried, go out from among God's people, because not of them; whilst some upright Christians are ready to stumble at the truths of God, because such men seem to be exceptions to them. But if this superficial religion will not stand present trials, how will it endure in the day of judgment?—Let us, however, beware of the thorns, as well as of the rock: many a man has "a name to live," whom God sees to be dead in sin; many deep convictions and serious purposes are choked by "the love of the world, and the things that are in the world:" (Note, 1 John 2:15—17.) thus no fruit is brought to perfection. Such professed Christians often draw their hope of heaven from the gospel; but their present comfort is derived from the world. The kingdom of God and his righteousness are placed last: (Note, 6:32,33.) and the getting, keeping, and spending of deceitful riches, or anxiety about secular affairs, rob them of their time, and at last of their souls; for unless the gospel render us fruitful, it will never bring us to glory. Let us then continually watch and pray against these fatal delusions; and keep at a distance from every degree of this pernicious attachment to worldly objects. Let us be instant in prayer for that "honest and good heart," which is the only soil in which the good seed will spring up, and grow, and ripen with a rich increase. This is the grand distinction between the Christian and all other men: and the preachers of the gospel do as much towards insuring success to their labours, when employed in earnest prayer to the Lord thus to prepare the people's hearts for the seed, as when faithfully dispensing the word of life; and in this part of the work, all that love the souls of men may afford them effectual assistance. Nor let it be forgotten, that there are different degrees of fruitfulness among true Christians, to which their own present comfort, and future glory, will be proportioned: we should therefore "abide in Christ, that we may bring forth much fruit," even "an hundred fold," that God may be glorified, and that all may know whose disciples we are. (Note, John 15:6—8.)

V. 24—30, 36—43. Besides the dangers to which men are exposed, through the deceitfulness of their own hearts, and the subtlety of Satan, even where the good seed is sown; there is also another set of dangers, from the bad seed, which the enemy is continually endeavouring to sow in the same field. Though the servants be watchful, this enemy will find time to work; but his chief advantage arises from their drowsiness, and unsuspecting inattention. No wonder then that so many spring up in the visible church, whose pernicious heresies, unchristian spirit, or immoral conduct, prove them to "be the children of the wicked one." The enemies of the gospel indeed charge all their pernicious sentiments, and enormous crimes, on the truth itself: this answers Satan's end; for many are thus prejudiced, and perish. But the servants of Christ know that they spring from seed of another kind; and often wonder, as well as grieve, to find tares where wheat was sown. This brings them to complain to their

CHAPTER XIV.

Herod supposes Jesus to be John the Baptist risen from the dead, 1, 2. An account of John's imprisonment and death through the resentment of Herod, Herodias, and her daughter, 3—12. Jesus departs to a desert place, and miraculously feeds the multitudes, 13—21. He retires to a mountain to pray, having sent the disciples away in a ship, 22—24. He comes to them walking on the sea, 25—27. Peter obtains leave to come on the water, begins to sink, and is preserved, and rebuked, 28—31. Jesus enters the ship, the storm ceases, and the disciples worship him as the Son of God, 32, 33. Landing at Gennesaret, he heals all the sick, who touch the hem of his garment, 34—36.

AT that time [a]Herod the [b]tetrarch heard of the fame of Jesus,

3 For [d]Herod had laid hold on John, and bound him, and put him in prison for Herodias' sake, [e]his brother Philip's wife.

4 For John said unto him, [f]It is not lawful for thee to have her.

Lord, and to ask counsel from him; and he shows them, "that an enemy hath done this."—It is indeed our duty to counteract, by all proper means, the effects of these fatal delusions; yet we may be too officious, in attempting to make a complete separation. This exceeds our ability; and if we attempt it, we shall be in danger of rooting up the wheat along with the tares. Thus the devil has often succeeded in bringing in furious controversies and accursed persecutions, under pretence of opposing and eradicating heresies; to the unspeakable detriment and reproach of the Christian church. Indeed, both must in general be left to grow together unto the harvest; and perfect purity must not be expected till we come to heaven. At length, however, an awful separation will be made: and then the angels of our glorious Judge will gather out of his kingdom "all that offend and work iniquity, and cast them into a furnace of fire, where shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." What a dreadful event will this be to the hypocrite and the deceiver, who will perish miserably with all those, who have been stumbled, prejudiced, deceived, and hardened by them! But, what a blessed event will this be for the true believer, who will then "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of his Father!" May this be our happy case, and may increasing numbers consider these things for their good!

V. 31—35, 44—50. In attempting to do good by scriptural means, and in dependence on the grace of our Lord, we have firm ground of hope, that from small beginnings a large increase will arise, perhaps after our decease: the grain of mustard-seed which we have sown and deemed to be lost, may at length spring up and become a tree; the leaven, which lay inactive in the hearts of the hearers, may be gradually diffusing its influence, till the whole lump be leavened; and thus several may hereafter appear to be cast into the very mould, and transformed into the very temper of the gospel, of whom perhaps we have now but faint hopes, or with whom we have no acquaintance. We ought not, therefore, either in this case, or in respect of individuals, or ourselves, "to despise the day of small things." (Note, Zech. 4:8—10.) As eternal life is set before us in the Scripture, like "a treasure hid in a field;" may we highly prize and diligently search that sacred book, that we may become acquainted with its invaluable contents, and do what we can to communicate the blessing to all others likewise. Let us also be very circumspect, that we do not come short of the felicity to which it directs us. And as all the salvation of God is laid up in Christ, our great Prophet, Priest, and King; let us fix our attention on him, as the great subject of the sacred word; and determine by the grace of God, to part with all that we have, that we may be made possessors of this inestimable treasure. What worthless pebbles are all worldly things, compared with this "Pearl of great price!" Why then should we hesitate to give up all for him? Why not count all loss, that we may win Christ? He who is willing to do this, will never come short of his Salvation, though he may often fear it; but he that prefers any thing to Christ, will not obtain his "unsearchable riches," though he may often be confident that he shall. Numbers of this description are enclosed in the gospel-net; and besides those multitudes of professed Christians, concerning whose character no competent judge can be deceived; the "fishers of men" will find themselves mistaken in some, of whom they hoped better things, when the grand discrimination shall be made. Yet they have abundant encouragement to go on with patience and diligence in their work: for "he that winneth souls is wise;" and in this respect, they will also find at last, that "their labour was not in vain in the Lord."

V. 51—58. We should often imagine to ourselves that our Teacher inquires of us, whether we "have understood all these things." And we should endeavour to be able, on good grounds, to answer him, "Yea, Lord." If we would be "scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven," we must be always learners. Our place is at Christ's feet; we must daily learn the old lessons over again, and new lessons also: and we must seek to have an increasing fund of knowledge and wisdom, the result of study, experience, and observation; that we may render old subjects attractive and interesting, by new elucidations and applications.

Let none wonder if faithful and able ministers are regarded with contempt and enmity, even where they labour most to do good, or where they might be supposed to possess the greatest influence. Men are seldom disposed to be taught by their neighbours or relations, or by their equals or inferiors. Even the wisdom, power, holiness, and beneficence of Christ, did not preserve him from the most illiberal prejudices and contempt, in his own city and among his own relations. It is a general case, that the truths spoken are at first disregarded, in proportion as the speaker is known, even where there is no reason for it in his character and conduct; for the carnal heart is glad of any pretence for rejecting the spiritual word of God. Thus, whilst the servant of the Lord loses his labour and is treated with contempt, men lose the benefit of the gospel, yea, lose their own souls; and the power and grace of the Saviour are of no avail as to them, "because of their unbelief."

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.) John was not cast into prison, till some considerable time after Jesus had entered on his public ministry. (Notes, John 3:22—36. 4:1—4.) It is supposed that John lay above a year in prison; and some time must have passed after his death, before Herod could conclude that he was risen again, to perform the miracles of which he heard. We may therefore suppose that more years had elapsed after Christ's baptism, than harmonizers in general can make out.—Herod is called "the tetrarch," and afterwards "the king." (9) He was the son of Herod the great, whose dominions were divided into four parts among his sons after his decease; as the word Tetrarch implies: Judea, one fourth in this division, soon fell under the rule of a Roman governor, as a province of that empire; and other alterations shortly took place. Herod, however, who was surnamed Antipas, was allowed to hold his tetrarchy; in which he was as much a king as his father had been, only his dominions were smaller. Some think that he was a Sadducee, because what is called the leaven of the Sadducees, is elsewhere called the leaven of Herod. (16:6. Mark 8:15.)—It is most wonderful, that Herod and his courtiers should not have known of our Lord's preaching and miracles at an earlier period; especially as he spent most of his time in Galilee.—Some think that Herod had been absent at Rome, during the former part of our Lord's ministry; but if this were so, his nobles and counsellors had not all been absent likewise. Others think, that he at this time attended to the report, because Christ had just sent forth his disciples, to work miracles in his name.—But the supposition, that Jesus was John the Baptist risen from the dead, implies that Herod had never heard of him before, or known that such a person existed; for how could he, who had lived about thirty years in Galilee, be John the Baptist, who a short time before had been put to death? In fact, nothing can solve the difficulty, but the consideration of the general disregard which persons in high rank show to the concerns of religion; and the astonishing ignorance in which most of them remain, of what goes forward in that respect.—At this time, however, the fame of our Lord's miracles was so widely circulated, the subject attracted so general attention, and so many opinions prevailed concerning it; that Herod, inattentive as he had hitherto been, could no longer remain in ignorance, but was constrained to form a judgment on these extraordinary events. Thus circumstanced, neither his immoral character, nor his Sadducean principles, could preserve him from dismay, on recollecting his conduct in beheading John the Baptist; and, without much examination, he was led to concur with those who said it was John risen from the dead. John had indeed wrought no miracle; but Herod, supposing that God had raised him to life again, concluded that he had also endued him with miraculous powers, to confirm his ministry. Nor could this haughty prince conceal, from his own servants, his terrors and convictions; fearing probably that John, thus risen, would soon come and avenge his death on his murderers.

neither signifies "to show forth," nor can it be properly rendered either passively or reciprocally, according to the use of it in the New Testament. It is transitive or absolute; 1 Cor. 12: 6,11. Gal. 2:8. 3:5. Eph. 1:11,20. 2:2.—These are the only instances in which the active verb occurs, except the parallel passage, Mark 6:14.—"These powers" (which Herod had heard were displayed by Jesus in his miracles, and which he supposed to be possessed by John as risen from the dead) "efficaciously work by him," or "are active in him." Herod, as a Sadducee, under the momentary impression, lost sight of his principles, that there was no resurrection, nor angel, nor spirit, into whatever agency he ultimately resolved the δυναμεις, powers, which wrought the effects.

V. 3—5. The Evangelist, having mentioned Herod's opinion respecting Jesus, made a digression to relate John's imprisonment and death. We learn from a parallel passage, (Notes, Mark 6:14—29.) that Herod had taken much notice of John, and attended to his instructions with apparent satisfaction, and "done many things" at his instance, regarding him as a holy man of God: but this did not satisfy John, so long as he retained Herodias, his brother's wife.—Josephus says, that Herodias was granddaughter to Herod the great: and consequently, she was niece both to her former husband Philip, and to Herod with whom she at this time lived. Herod had divorced his own wife in order to take her; and her husband Philip was still living, as well as the daughter whom he had by her. So that no connexion could be more contrary to the law of God, and to all decorum, than this was. John therefore, being a prophet, and no courtier, plainly reproved Herod, having been brought near to him, on whom otherwise he perhaps would not have obtruded himself; and declared that it was not lawful for him to retain Herodias: and it is probable, many would think, that he should for a time at least, have connived at this irregularity; as kings and princes generally deem themselves privileged in these respects. But John knew nothing of reserves or exceptions, being an Elijah in intrepidity and faithfulness. His conduct, therefore, greatly offended Herod, and Herodias still more: so that John was cast into prison, and by the instigation of Herodias, (who was another Jezebel,) Herod was desirous of putting him to death; and that contrary to his own conscience, for he feared him as a holy and righteous man. He was, however, restrained by fear of the people, who regarded John as a prophet; and Herod dreaded lest they should make an insurrection, should he proceed to extremities. These motives induced him for a time to resist the importunity of Herodias, though he kept John still in prison: while Herodias retained her malice, and waited her opportunity of wreaking her vengeance on him, considering his reproof of Herod as an insult on her character; as well as interfering with her ambition and inclination.—When he would. (5) Θελων, purposing, willing.

V. 6, 7. At length Herod celebrated his birthday, entertaining his nobles with great magnificence; and Herodias's daughter, (whose name was Salome, and who probably possessed all exterior accomplishments,) contrary to general custom, came and danced before all the company, in order to honour the guests and grace the entertainment. (Note, Esth. 1:10—12.) This so delighted Herod, who might be heated with wine, that he rashly and impiously promised her, with repeated oaths, that he would give her whatever she asked, though equal in value to half his kingdom. Thus profusely would he reward a worthless dance; whilst a prison and death were the recompense of "the man of God," who honestly sought the salvation of his soul!

V. 8—11. On this proposal, Salome retired to consult her mother, how the most advantage might be made of it: and, revenge getting the better of all other passions, Herodias persuaded and urged her daughter (who must have been reluctant to give up all those objects, which would be desirable to her youthful mind) to demand the head of John the Baptist without delay, in a charger, or large dish! When Herod heard this strange request, he was sorry: probably not so much from desire of preserving John's life, as from fear of consequences, and checks of conscience; and as some think, from considering the execution as a bad omen on his birthday. But, though he was in some sense sorry, that the demand had been made so suddenly and on this occasion; yet, pleading his oath and his regard for his guests, he commanded the immediate execution of John. Herod's oath was rash and profane in the extreme; and when it was found to involve such consequences, it became absolutely unlawful to observe it: he ought to have repented of his impiety, and with abhorrence to have rejected Salome's application. Nor was it very honourable to his guests to suppose that they would be offended, if he refused to murder this holy man, through a rash engagement at a banquet, in their presence. Had Salome demanded the execution of some esteemed chieftain among them, who had displeased Herodias, they would doubtless have arisen to oppose the demand with one accord: (Note, 1 Sam. 14:45,46.) but probably John was obnoxious to many of them, as well as to Herodias. Accordingly he was suddenly and speedily dismissed to his eternal rest; and his head, reeking in its blood, was brought as a strange present to Salome, and by her given to her mother, who is reported to have treated it with indignant barbarity. It was customary for the heads of criminals to be thus brought to those who condemned them, in order to certify that they were really put to death; and this horrid spectacle could gratify the malevolence even of a female! Thus by a mysterious providence, this most eminent man of God was cut off, in the prime of life and fitness for usefulness, to gratify the malice of an incestuous adulteress, to recompense the vain exhibition of a giddy young female, by the orders of a rash, perhaps intoxicated prince, and to humour the companions of his revels! But they could not long enjoy this impious and cruel triumph. It is recorded that Salome had her head cut off by the ice, through its breaking as she passed over it. But, however that was, Herod was shortly after engaged in a disastrous war on account of Herodias; he was at length expelled his territories, and they both died in exile in a distant land: and, as it is recorded, hated by and hating one another.

V. 13, 14. This seems to refer, not to our Lord's hearing of John's death, but of Herod's supposition, that he was John the Baptist risen from the dead: being a continuation of the subject from the second verse.—About the same time the apostles returned to him; (Marg. Ref. y.) and Jesus, to avoid observation, as well as to give them some relaxation, departed in a small vessel into an unfrequented place, on the shore of the sea of Tiberias. But the people, hearing which way he bent his course, followed him by land to a great distance from their cities and villages. And when he saw them, he did not object to the intrusion, but compassionately healed all the sick persons whom they had been able to bring along with them; as well as taught the people many things. 27 But straightway Jesus spake unto them, saying, [t]Be of good cheer; [u]it is I, be not afraid.

28 And Peter answered him and said, Lord, if it be thou, [x]bid me come unto thee on the water.

29 And he said, Come. And when Peter was come down out of the ship, [y]he walked on the water, to go to Jesus.

30 But [z]when he saw the wind [a]boisterous, he was afraid; and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, [a]Lord, save me.

31 And immediately Jesus [b]stretched forth his hand [c]and caught him, and said unto him, [d]O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou [e]doubt?

32 And when they were [f]come into the ship, the wind ceased.

stated that, as the time was past, it would be proper to dismiss the people, that they might reach the neighbouring villages before night, and thus procure lodging and victuals. But Jesus answered, that they need not depart; for the disciples ought to give them food.—On examination, they found that no more than five loaves, (barley-loaves,) and two fishes, could be procured for the whole company. But Jesus ordered this small provision to be brought; and having, with uplifted eyes, returned thanks, and prayed for a blessing on it, which we may suppose to have been his constant custom; (Marg. Ref. g.) he began to break and distribute the bread and the fishes to the disciples, that they might dispense it to the multitude: and it is probable, that the portion given to each continued to increase, by his creating power, as they dispensed it, till the whole multitude was sufficed. He then ordered them to gather together the fragments, that nothing might be lost; when they found they had twelve baskets full left, which seems to have been far more than they had at first; and, on these broken pieces of barley-bread and dried fish we may suppose that Jesus and his disciples made afterwards many a contented and thankful meal.—As the men were placed on the grass, by hundreds and by fifties, (Note, Mark 6:30—46, v. 40.) it appeared that five thousand men had thus been fed, besides women and children: who probably were arranged in a separate company.—'There was more real grandeur displayed by the Master of this feast, than by Ahasuerus in that royal feast, which was intended to show "the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honour of his excellent majesty."' Henry.

V. 22—24. (Marg. Ref.) The multitudes, concluding Jesus to be the promised Messiah, purposed to make him their King; (John 6:15.) and as the apostles might be disposed to concur, our Lord constrained them to put to sea without him: he then dismissed the people, who retired quietly to their own homes. Instead, however, of resting after his fatigues, he himself retired to a mountain to pray. (Marg. Ref. n.) He had no sins to be pardoned or subdued: but he had manifold and immense services, temptations, and sufferings before him, through which he was to pass, as Man, in dependence on the power, truth, and love of God; he had the cause of his disciples, and that of his church to plead; his delight was in communion with the Father; and he acted as our Surety and Example. So that when the evening was come, or the day closed, he was on a mountain alone; and there he continued during the greatest part of the night. In the mean time the disciples met with tempestuous weather and a contrary wind.—'We must sail even through mighty tempests; and Christ will never forsake us, so that we go whither he hath commanded us.' Beza.

V. 25—27. The fourth watch of the night began three hours before sunrise; and during these three hours, Jesus came to the disciples, perhaps after daybreak.—'Note, that to walk on the sea is made the property of God, "who alone spreadeth the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea." Job 9:8.' Whitby.—'The picture of two feet, walking on the sea, was an Egyptian hieroglyphic for an impossible thing.' Doddridge. It was, no doubt, an attestation that He was the God of nature, the Lord of the creation; and also an emblem of his power over all the troubles and persecutions which disquiet his church.—The disciples, however, cried out for excess of terror; supposing that what they saw was either the apparition of some deceased person, foreboding evil, or an apostate spirit coming to do them some mischief.—'That the Jews had then an opinion of hurtful spirits walking in the night is evident from the seventy, who render, "from the pestilence walking in darkness," (Ps. 91:6.) from the fear of the devils, that walk in the night.' Whitby.—To allay their terror Jesus spake to the disciples with his usual voice, assuring them that it was he, their Lord and Friend.

V. 28—32. Peter, from the first, appears a man of integrity, who had very exalted thoughts of Jesus, and a cordial affection to him; but of a sanguine temper, and not deeply acquainted with his own heart: he was therefore always most forward to speak, to propose, to object, and attempt. When he saw Jesus walking on the sea, he found himself excited to a very high confidence, and he desired permission to come to him on the water; probably, expecting a commendation of the strength of his faith. But our Lord, to show him his weakness, and to teach all his disciples many useful lessons, bade him come; and Peter without hesitation attempted to walk on the unstable waves! Indeed, as long as his faith was fixed upon the divine power of Christ, he was actually enabled to do it; but the boisterousness of the elements, soon drew off his attention, and staggered his faith, and then he began to sink. Yet still he relied on his Lord for deliverance in this extreme danger; and, in answer to his application, Jesus caught him by the hand, and brought him safe to the vessel, at the same time rebuking him, as one of little faith.—'By faith we tread under our feet even the tempests themselves; but yet by the virtue' (or power) 'of Christ, who helpeth that virtue, which he of his mercy hath given.' Beza.—Peter's doubting did not relate to his own acceptance, or final salvation, but to the power of Christ to preserve him from sinking amidst the violence of the storm. V. 33. The apostles, who seem to have been more impressed with this, than any of our Lord's preceding miracles, came with one accord, and prostrated themselves before him in adoration, declaring that "of a truth he was the Son of God:" nor did he in the least decline the honour which they rendered to him.—It does not appear, that any, except the apostles and those who belonged to the vessel, were present. To suppose additional mariners, heathen mariners, on board this fisherboat, the property of fishermen, on an inland lake in Galilee; in order to explain away this confession to Christ, as if it only meant a son of a god, according to pagan notions, and as made by the gentiles alone; strikingly shows, how unwilling many learned men are to admit the obvious conclusion: but even on this supposition, the words cannot admit that construction. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The terror and reproaches of conscience, which the most daring offenders cannot absolutely shake off, are both a demonstration of future judgment, and an anticipation of their future misery. Those who rebel against the light of the sacred oracles, and that of their own convictions; and who quarrel with religion and its ministers (contrary to their own better judgment) for the sake of some favourite iniquity, which they are determined to retain, are frequently given up to judicial hardness of heart: and companions in licentiousness often tempt each other to revenge and murder.—When the servants of Christ, by faithful reproofs, interfere with the sensual, interested, or ambitious schemes of abandoned transgressors; their resentment sometimes proves more powerful even than their other most domineering passions: not only are men on these occasions regardless of equity, humanity, or truth; but women may be wrought up to such a pitch of fury and vengeance, as to thirst for blood, more than for any of those objects, to which they would otherwise be most addicted. Yet "the man of God" being fully aware of these consequences, must, if fairly called to the service, rebuke the greatest with all authority. In doubtful matters indeed, tenderness and caution, as well as prudence, are requisite: but when men in the most exalted stations live in evident violations of the divine law, and attempt to compromise by religious professions and observances, we must in no degree abet their delusion, by connivance or silence, but must fairly discharge our consciences, by declaring their conduct to be absolutely unlawful and inconsistent with all religion. They must be clearly warned, that this is "the right hand, which they are required to cut off," if they would save their souls from hell. Indeed, the servants of God will thus incur the reproach of rudeness and bigotry; and, even from the more timid Christian, the censure of imprudence and want of courtesy: and if those, whom they thus counsel and reprove in love, do not profit by their faithful admonitions, they will certainly be offended, and perhaps exasperated to persecution. Yet the Lord will honour them and bear them out: nor can their most powerful or enraged enemies proceed any further than he sees good and even the fear of man, though it in many cases "bringeth a snare," often restrains wicked men from acting out all the evil that is conceived in their hearts.

V. 6—12. When malice is harboured, opportunities will be found to gratify it: and we have little ground, from Scripture, to favour those festive occasions, which are so highly celebrated in this vain world. (Gen. 40: P. O. latter part.) When reflection is dissipated, and conscience stupified by clamorous mirth, and when the passions are inflamed by sensual indulgence, men easily accede to insidious proposals, or form rash engagements; and, by yielding to the present emotion, ensure future and bitter repentance. It seems a general rule among the rich and great, (though it has some honourable exceptions,) to reward men in an inverse proportion to the value of their services: so that no liberality is too great to be lavished on those, who minister to indulgence and dissipation; useful employments are far more parsimoniously encouraged; and endeavours to save their souls are recompensed by reproaches, contempt, or persecution.—The vile occasions and impious manner, in which oaths are often used, form also another proof of the contempt of God and religion which generally prevails. But, how lamentable is the case of those young persons, whose parents are their tempters to impiety and vice; and who are urged on to the greatest enormities, even by regard to parental counsel and authority! Yet thousands have been thus tutored for destruction by those, who were the instruments of their wretched existence, and whose guilt and punishment must be still immensely more aggravated.—Hasty measures are seldom wise: and could we see the predominant inclinations of many, who appear gentle, tender, and modest; we should be as much shocked, as if we had heard Salome's request, that the head of John might be brought to her in a charger.—Men may be sorry, in doing those things, which they are resolved to proceed with; for they grieve, that they must venture so much to gratify their inclinations: but they find, or pretend, some reason for getting over their scruples; and in this way they often more impose on themselves, than on others.—Rash oaths and bad companions are above all things to be avoided: but if men are entangled by them, they ought rather to infringe the sinful oath, and to affront their wicked associates, than to add sin to sin, and ruin their own souls.—The only wise God may see good to let the lives of his most valuable servants fall a sacrifice to the humours and passions of his vilest enemies; but death can never find them unprepared, or prevent them from finishing their work and testimony; and the manner of leaving this world is of small moment, when the conscience is at peace, hope assured, and God their Comforter; the more speedily, the less their sufferings commonly are. But how different will be the hour of death, and the season of righteous retribution, to their impenitent persecutors!—Whoever is cut off, the Lord Jesus still lives to take care of his cause; and when we have paid our tribute of respect and affection to his deceased servants, we must apply to him for support, and for directions about redoubled diligence in his service.

V. 13—21. We should indeed give place to the resentment of persecutors, and shun ostentation: but we must not refuse to do good for fear of trouble or reproach, or for the sake of ease and indulgence.—In promoting the welfare of souls, we should have consideration and compassion for the bodies of men also, and endeavour to relieve their wants, and redress their inconveniences. Yet, even disciples are prone to excuse themselves, and to leave this to others, on various pretences, especially on that of poverty. But our Lord frequently, as it were, says to us, "They need not depart: give ye them to eat:" and a little, properly managed, and brought to him for his blessing, will go further than it is commonly supposed. He does not, in general, give his disciples a great fund to begin with; but he disposes them to make a proper use of a little; and when this is done in "the obedience of faith," it increases in their hands, and they are rather enriched, than impoverished, by liberality.—Those who serve Christ must not covet delicacies: he uses his power to feed, not to feast, his people: and whilst the rich recollect how he and his disciples fared, they should learn to spare from their own expenses to feed his poor; and the poor should learn to be contented with their mean food, which is seldom less luxurious, than that with which the Saviour of the world was pleased to satisfy his hunger.—We should all learn to thank God, and to crave his blessing, at our meals: and to avoid all profusion and waste: remembering that our Lord would not suffer the fragments of this miraculous provision to be lost; and considering that frugality is the proper source of liberality.—But we see also, in this miracle, an emblem of "the Bread of life, which came down from heaven," to sustain our perishing souls: the provisions of his gospel appear to the carnal eye mean and scanty; yet they suffice for the whole

CHAPTER XV.

Jesus reproves the scribes and Pharisees, for setting their traditions above God's commandments; and exposes their hypocrisy, 1—9. He warns the people against their doctrine, and shows the source and nature of defilement, 10—20. He tries the faith, and heals the daughter of a woman of Canaan, 21—28; heals great numbers at the sea of Galilee, 29—31, and again feeds the multitude by a miracle, 32—39.

THEN [a]came to Jesus [b]scribes and Pharisees, [c]which were of Jerusalem, saying,

2 Why do thy disciples [d]transgress the tradition of the elders? for they wash not their hands when they eat bread.

3 But he answered and said unto them, [e]Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your tradition?

4 For [f]God commanded, saying, [g]Honour thy father and mother: and, [h]He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death.

5 But [i]ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father, or his mother, [k]It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me;

6 And [l]honour not his father or his mother, he shall be free. [m]Thus have ye made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition.

multitude, who 'feed on him, in their hearts, by faith, with thanksgiving:' and his ministers may go forth confidently, to break the bread of life to their auditories; assured that it will increase in their hands, and supply the wants of all who hunger; and that whilst they feed others, they will also enrich themselves.

V. 22—36. Even in those places, to which the Lord has evidently appointed us, we may expect storms and difficulties: but when we have not the sensible comfort of his presence amidst our conflicts, we may by faith realize his watchful eye over us, and his intercession continually made in our behalf; and rest assured, that in due time he will come to our relief. We should enjoy far more comfort, did we more zealously copy his example in the days of his humiliation; and were more careful not to omit fervent, constant prayer, on account of any engagements or interruptions.—We are sometimes troubled at those incidents which denote our deliverance; but our Lord beholds our fears, and will make himself known for our encouragement: and, whatever danger or trouble may assail or alarm us, in life or at death, considering that all power is in our Redeemer's hands, and all events are ordered by his appointment, we may comfortably hear him say to us in every one of them, "It is I, be not afraid."—We find it hard to be very humble without dejection, or animated without self-complacency: but our faith is irregular, when it leads us to desire or attempt difficult or perilous services, without a proper call. The Lord, however, often lets his servants have their choice, in order to humble and prove them, and to show the greatness of his power and grace. In the most perilous situation to which he calls us, if our faith be steadfastly fixed on his infinite power, truth, and love, we may proceed with safety and confidence. But when we look off from him, and view the greatness of opposing difficulties and perils, we begin to fall: yet if we feel ourselves sinking under trouble or temptation, or into destruction, and earnestly apply to him, he will stretch out the arm of his power to deliver us. But he will rebuke the weak believer, though he will not leave him to perish: and when we vainly expect a commendation of our wisdom and strength, we commonly are convicted of weakness and folly, and incur rebukes and chastisements.—We ought indeed to doubt, and to examine ourselves, whether we be true disciples or not: but we never should doubt the power of Christ to save and help all those who call upon him.—The dangers, trials, and humiliations of the believer, will eventually render the Saviour more glorious in his eyes, and precious to his heart.—Were men more acquainted with him, and with the distempered state of their souls, they would flock to him that they might experience his healing influence; for all who touch him, though with a feeble trembling faith, shall in due season be made perfectly whole: and, whilst we consider all these wonders of his divine power and love, shall we refuse to adore him, or to acknowledge, that "of a truth He is the Son of God?" Or shall we neglect to do what we can, to bring others to him for the healing and saving of their souls?

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1, 2. The report of our Lord's miracles seems to have given great uneasiness to the scribes and Pharisees at Jerusalem; and some of them had come in order to watch his conduct, and to seek for matter of accusation against him. But not finding that he, or his disciples, neglected any part of the divine law, they objected to him his disregard of "the tradition of the elders." It was pretended by them, and still is by modern Jews, that these traditions were originally received from God by immediate revelation, and were of equal authority with the written law; and that they had been delivered down, by word of mouth, from one to another, through successive generations. Thus the scribes, who were the supposed repositories and interpreters of them, had the power of altering them, and imposing them on the people, according to their convenience: in the same manner as the church of Rome long maintained its usurped authority, by dictating to the whole western church under similar pretensions; and as it still maintains that usurpation through many populous regions. 'Whosoever despiseth the washing of hands, is worthy to be excommunicated, he comes to poverty, and will be extirpated out of the world.' ... 'He that eats bread with unwashen hands, does as bad as if he committed whoredom.' ... 'R. Aquiba, being in prison, and not having water enough to drink, and to wash his hands, chose to do the latter, saying, It was better to die with thirst, than transgress the traditions of the elders.' ... 'The religious of old did eat their common food in cleanness, ... and they were called Pharisees. And this is a matter of the highest sanctity, and the way of the highest religion, that a man separate himself, and go aside from the vulgar; and that he neither touch them, nor eat or drink with them: for such separation conduceth to the purity of the body from evil works, the purity of the body conduceth to the cleansing of the soul from evil affections, and the sanctity of the soul conduceth to the likeness of God.' ... 'Whosoever hath his seat in the land of Israel, and eateth his common food in cleanness, and speaks the holy language, and recites his phylacteries morning and evening; let him be confident that he shall obtain the life of the world to come.' Jewish writers, quoted by Whitby.

The tradition. (2) Τὴν παράδοσιν. ('Παράδοσις' traditio, actus tradendi: etiam per meton. ipsa res quæ traditur.' Schleusner.—A παραδίδωμι.) Mark 7:3,13. 1 Cor. 11:2. Gal. 1:14. Col. 2:8. 2 Thes. 2:15. 3:6.

V. 3—6. (Note, Deut. 4:2.) All additions to the laws of God are an infringement of his legislative authority; and a presumptuous imputation on his wisdom, as if he had omitted something necessary which man could supply; and, in one way or other, they always clash with the divine precepts: so that an attachment to human traditions necessarily leads men, in some circumstances, or in some respects, to disobey God; and it is evident that our Lord had expressly taught his disciples to disregard them. Doubtless they, at this time, observed the ceremonial distinction of meats, and other divine appointments. Jesus therefore answered the scribes by asking them, "Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God by your traditions?"—'The words of the scribes are lovely, above the words of the law, and more weighty than the words of the law or the prophets.' Quotation in Whitby.—Our Lord then selected one instance, in proof of this charge. The law, delivered from mount Sinai, and written on the tables of stone by God himself, contained this command: "Honour thy father and thy mother." 'By honour is meant all kind of duty which children owe to their parents.' Beza (Note, Ex. 20:12.) And in the judicial law, he had commanded, that "he who cursed father or mother, should be put to death." (Marg. Ref. g, h.)—Now it must be as wicked to do evil to parents, or to withhold the good due to them, as to wish that evil might befall them; especially as the latter might be done in a sudden passion, and the former must be deliberate and habitual. Yet the scribes had decided, by their traditions, that in case a son should say to his parents, however aged, poor, and distressed, that he had vowed to the treasury whatever he could spare, and by which he might have assisted them; and should thus excuse himself from showing respect, gratitude, or kindness to them, leaving them in indigence, whilst he lived in plenty; he must not only not be required, but he ought not to be suffered, to do any thing for them: it being, probably, expected from him to put money from time to time into the treasury, (of which the scribes and priests had the charge,) by way of compensation for his omission. Thus, from a vain pretence of piety, they directly repealed God's law, and rendered it "of none effect by their traditions:" and, as this was only one instance out of very many, their traditions must be disregarded and opposed, in order that the law of God might be honoured and obeyed.—'If a man can answer his parents, when they need any relief, and tell them, I have bound myself with an oath, that I will not do any thing to the relief of my father or mother: or, as some understand it, O father, that by which thou shouldest be relieved by me, is a gift already devoted to God, and cannot without impiety be otherwise employed; and by this piety to God I may be as profitable ... to thee; for God will repay it to me and thee in our needs: he is under obligation not to give it to his father. ... A father, being in want, requires relief from his son; the son answers, that he hath vowed he will not; so that to him it remains not lawful to relieve him; and the Pharisees approve of this practice; that he may thus evacuate his duty to his parent: and though quite contrary to the precept of honouring and relieving them, yet it was by them thought obligatory to the frustrating of that commandment. And many cases are set down, wherein it doth so, in Maimonides and the Rabbins.' Hammond.—The pretence of devoting to God the property thus withheld from the parent, as the occasion of the oath seems implied.—

7 Ye [p]hypocrites, [q]well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying,

8 This people [r]draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; [s]but their heart is far from me.

9 But [t]in vain they do worship me, [u]teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.

[Practical Observations.]

10 And [v]he called the multitude, and said unto them, [w]Hear, and understand:

11 Not [x]that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; [y]but that which cometh out of the [z]mouth, this defileth a man.

12 ¶ Then came his disciples, and said unto him, [a]Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended, after they heard this saying?

13 But he answered and said, [b]Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up.

14 [c]Let them alone: [d]they be blind leaders of the blind. [e]And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch.

15 Then answered Peter and said unto him, [f]Declare unto us this parable.

16 And Jesus said, [g]Are ye also yet without understanding?

17 Do not ye yet understand, [h]that whatsoever entereth in at the mouth goeth into the belly, [i]and is cast out into the draught?

18 But [k]those things, which proceed out of the mouth, come forth from the heart; and they defile the man.

19 For [l]out of the heart proceed [m]evil thoughts murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies:

20 These are the things [n]which defile a man: [o]but to eat with unwashen hands defileth not a man.

[Practical Observations.]

A man may be so bound by them,' (that is, by vows,) 'that he cannot, without great sin, do what God had by his law required to be done. So that if he made a vow, which laid him under a necessity to violate God's law that he might observe it, his vow must stand, and the law be abrogated.' Jewish canon from Pocock.—This specimen is sufficient to lead any reflecting person to conclude, that human traditions and the law of God cannot subsist together; but the prevalence of the former must inevitably lead to make void the latter: and this consideration shows the reason of our Lord's most decided opposition to the system of tradition. V. 7—9. In concluding this reply, our Lord declared the scribes and Pharisees to be hypocrites, whose character the prophet had well described. They approached God in his ordinances with good words, and honoured him with fair professions; but their hearts were estranged from his holy character, law, and service, through pride, avarice, and wickedness: so that their very worship was vain, and unprofitable to themselves; even as their instructions were to the people, whilst they taught them the traditions of men, instead of the word of God. The passage in the prophet seems to refer as much to the deluded people, as to their false teachers. (Note, Is. 29:13—16.)

V. 10, 11. When Jesus had thus answered the scribes, he saw good to caution the people also against their delusions. He therefore called them around him, and exhorted them carefully to hear, that they might understand, his words: and he assured them, that the defilement, of which they ought to be afraid, did not arise from what entered the mouth as food; but from those evil words, which proceeded out of their mouths, as the result of the wickedness of their hearts.—This was an intimation of the inferior value of ceremonial observances, and of their speedy abolition: it cogently instructed the hearers, that real pollution was not an adventitious matter from without, but the genuine produce of man's fallen nature; and that the tongue was one main instrument in bringing forth and propagating it.—'A man may bring guilt upon himself, by eating what is pernicious to his health, or by excess in ... food or liquor: and a Jew might have done it by ... eating what was forbidden by the ... law; ... yet, in all these instances, the pollution would arise from the wickedness of the heart, and be just proportionable to it.' Doddridge.—'It is evident that, in our Lord's judgment, the whole multitude was capable of understanding those things, which the Pharisees did not, and by which the traditions ... were overthrown.' Whithy.

(Note, Tit. 1:14—16.) What is not "sanctified by the word of God and prayer," or not done from regard to God, continues to be common and unclean even under the gospel.

V. 12—14. When our Lord had spoken these words, he retired: and the disciples came to him, apparently with much concern, to inform him how greatly the Pharisees were offended, or stumbled, by his direct attack on their traditions. To this he answered, that "every plant which his heavenly Father had not planted, should be rooted up:" meaning, that the teaching and traditions of the scribes and Pharisees, not being from God, must be destroyed to make room for true religion; and it was therefore proper to expose them before all the people. But the words are a universal rule, in respect to teachers, doctrines, observances, and every thing relative to religion: all, which is not from God, has no authority or excellency, and cannot be of long duration; and true godliness can never prosper, till these weeds and suckers be extirpated, which draw away the nourishment from its root.—As to the scribes and Pharisees, they must be let alone; (Note, 7:6.) for, whilst they presumed to guide others, they were most ignorant and deluded themselves: and they would fall into the pit of destruction with their obstinate followers, as a blind leader of a blind man falls with him into a ditch, or into some mischief.—'Regard not what they say or do, ... seeing they say and do it out of the blindness of their minds.... Sometimes the vulgar are obliged not to believe, or comply with, the rules of their ecclesiastical superiors; because it is their duty never to follow them into the ditch.' Whitby.

V. 15—20. Peter, hearing this answer, in the name of all the apostles, desired of Christ an explication of the parable; for probably it seemed to them contrary to the Mosaic law, as well as to the traditions of the scribes. And Jesus, having reproved their dulness, proceeded to show them, that their food (if not unlawful or intemperate) could not by any contracted pollution defile them: for it entered not into the heart, and had no effect on the state of the soul; but it went into the stomach, and all which was unsuitable to nourish the body, was carried off by a regular process of nature, without communicating any sinful defilement. But those things which proceeded out of the mouth, came from the heart: when lies, impiety, blasphemy, or wickedness were uttered, corrupt nature expressed itself; and this defiled a man in the sight of God. Indeed, from the same corrupt source all kind of wickedness proceeded; such as polluting, malicious, proud, or covetous imaginations, and corrupt, perverse reasonings against God and true religion; and even murders, adulteries, and every species of lewdness, injustice, and impiety. These crimes were indeed perpetrated by the body, but they were conceived in the heart, and proved its desperate wickedness this rendered men loathsome and filthy in God's sight; and not eating their meals with unwashen hands. Such things related only to natural decency, and were no part of religion.

22 And, behold, [o]a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, [p]Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou [q]Son of David: [r]my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil.

23 But [s]he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, [t]Send her away; for she crieth after us.

24 But he answered and said, [u]I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

25 Then [v]came she and [w]worshipped him, saying, [x]Lord, help me.

26 But he answered and said, [y]It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs.

27 And she said, [z]Truth, Lord: [a]yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table.

28 Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, [b]great is thy faith: [c]be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour. [Practical Observations.]

29 ¶ And Jesus departed from thence, [d]and came nigh [e]unto the sea of Galilee; and [f]went up into a mountain, and sat down there.

30 And [g]great multitudes came unto him, having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and he healed them:

31 Insomuch that the multitude wondered when they saw [m]the dumb to speak, [n]the maimed to be whole, [o]the lame to walk, and the blind to see: [p]and they glorified the [q]God of Israel.

32 Then [r]Jesus called his disciples unto him, and said, [s]I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now [t]three days, [u]and have nothing to eat: and I will not send them away fasting, [x]lest they faint in the way.

33 And his disciples say unto him, [y]Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness; as [z]to fill so great a multitude?

34 And Jesus saith unto them, [a]How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven, and a [b]few little fishes.

35 And he commanded the multitude [c]to sit down on the ground.

36 And he took the seven loaves and the fishes, [d]and gave thanks, and brake them, and gave to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude.

37 And they did [e]all eat, and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left, [f]seven baskets full.

38 And they that did eat were four thousand men, beside women and children.

39 And [g]he sent away the multitude, and took ship, and came into the coasts of Magdala.

V. 21—24. After this offence given to the scribes, our Lord retired to the most remote part of the land, in the borders of Tyre and Zidon; and, though he used proper means for concealing himself, his coming was soon known. (Mark 7:24.) For a woman of Canaan, a Syro-phenician, (probably descended from the ancient Canaanites, a remnant of whom had taken shelter in Tyre and the adjacent regions,) heard of his miracles; having before this renounced idolatry, and become a worshipper of the true God. Doubtless she had become acquainted with the Scriptures of the prophets, probably by means of the Greek translation; and, comparing what she read with what she heard, was fully satisfied that Jesus was the promised Messiah. Having therefore this opportunity, and being in distress, she made earnest supplication to him: calling him Lord, and addressing him as "the Son of David." But he heard her with silence, and apparent neglect, intending to prove and manifest the strength of her humble faith. The disciples however, pitying her distress, or wearied with her importunity, requested him to grant her petition and dismiss her; and, in her hearing, he replied, that he was not sent to the Gentiles, but to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

Of Canaan. (22) Χαναναια. (Α Χανααν· Acts 7:11. 13:19.) Not elsewhere in the New Testament.—Ἑλληνις, Συροφοινισσα τω γενει· Mark 7:26.

V. 25—28. The answer of our Lord, above mentioned, so far from offending this humble suppliant, excited her to redouble her expressions of reverence, falling down before him, and entreating him to help her. To this he answered, apparently with harshness, and in a manner which seemed to preclude all hope, that it would be improper to rob the children of their bread, in order to feed the dogs. (Note, 7:6.) Thus the Jews used, proudly and contemptuously, to distinguish themselves from the Gentiles: and the woman might, and if she had not been a very humble believer, she would have taken great offence; disdaining the title of dogs, and altering her opinion of One, who had treated her most respectful address in a manner so contrary to her expectation. But, being conscious of personal unworthiness, and recollecting her Gentile extraction, and above all, filled with the highest sentiments of the dignity, wisdom, and excellency of Christ, she submitted patiently and meekly to the mortifying distinction; and by a peculiar ingenuity turned it into a cogent argument in support of her petition. 'Truth, Lord,' as if she had said, 'I am a vile sinner of the Gentiles, and have no claim to the privileges of God's people; but the dogs eat the fragments of a plentiful table, without the least disadvantage to the children: and thy power and mercy are so large, that thou canst heal my daughter, without in the least deducting from the blessings intended for thine Israel.'—Our Lord's purpose was now answered; and, having openly commended the greatness of the woman's faith notwithstanding all her disadvantages, he assured her that her daughter was healed, and in a manner which intimated that all her other desires were, or would be granted.

V. 31. Maimed.] It is generally allowed, that the word here used, in its primary meaning signifies such persons as have been deprived of their limbs; and the restoration of them may be considered as one of the most stupendous effects of our Lord's creating power. 'The word (κυλλος) which we render maimed, does in the strictest propriety, ... signify one whose hand or arm had been cut off; (Mark 9:43.) but it is sometimes applied to those who were only disabled in those parts. ... It is reasonable to suppose, that among the many maimed, who were brought on these occasions, there were some whose limbs had been cut off; and I think, hardly any of the miracles of our Lord were more illustrious and amazing, than the recovery of such.' Doddridge.—'Men that had lost their limbs.' Hammond.

V. 32—38. (Notes and P. O. 14:13—21.) The multitudes on this occasion continued with our Lord three days, or till the third day, so that they must have lodged out of doors two nights, which might be done in those warm climates without any great inconvenience: but it shows the earnestness with which they listened to his instructions.—It appears wonderful that the disciples should renew their objection, when Christ had declared his compassionate purpose of feeding the multitude, especially as their provision was something larger, and the number present not so great as before. The word rendered baskets is different from that so translated in the preceding chapter, (κοφινους); and the same distinction is made in the original, in all the places where either of these miracles is mentioned. Some think, that the word in this place signifies a larger basket than the other, but others suppose exactly the contrary.

CHAP XVI.

Jesus rebukes the [illegible] of the Pharisees and Sadducees, who required a sign from heaven, refuses to give any but the sign of Jonas, 1—4. He warns his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, explains his meaning, and reproves the disciples for unbelief and want of understanding, 5—12. The opinions of the people concerning him, 13, 14. Peter confesses him, 15—17. The [illegible] of the church, and the [illegible] Jesus reproves Peter for his carnal views concerning his kingdom, and [illegible] rebukes Peter for dissuading him from suffering, 21—23. He shows, that his disciples must deny themselves, and suffer, in prospect of a future reward, 24—27. The speedy establishment of his kingdom, 28.

THE [a]Pharisees also, with the [b]Sadducees, came, and [c]tempting desired him that he would show them [d]a sign from heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The most virulent enemies of vital godliness are often extremely tenacious of their own inventions in religion, by which they dress up a vain pageant to amuse their consciences, and to impose on the ignorant.—The disciples of Christ are fully justified in disregarding the traditions of men, however sanctioned, by the contrariety of those traditions, in many things, to the holy law of God. How thankful ought we to be for the written word, when oral traditions are so liable to error, perversion, and uncertainty!—Never let us for a moment imagine, that the religion of the Bible can be improved by any possible additions, doctrinal or practical: but common sense will teach a candid inquirer to distinguish between those circumstances of worship which each society must order for itself, though none have a right to impose on others; and those inventions which corrupt the purity, destroy the simplicity, and deform the spiritual beauty of religious worship.—We should peculiarly advert to our Lord's marked attention to the due performance of relative duties, especially that of children to their parents. No forms, notions, subscription to charities, building churches or chapels, or any thing else which looks like faith, zeal, or piety, can prove that man a true Christian who neglects to "honour his father and mother," or to supply their wants according to his ability. To dispense with this, or other duties, on such grounds, would be as unscriptural as to say, "It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me." Indeed temporal death is not now inflicted on him who curses his parents: yet a far more dreadful punishment will be awarded hereafter to all disobedient children, if they continue impenitent; and they must expect no comfort or blessing from God even in this present world.—Alas! too many "draw near to God with their mouth and honour him with their lips, whilst their hearts are far from him," and thus prove that they worship him in vain. And this is the case, not only among those who "teach for doctrines the commandments of men;" but even with many who profess evangelical religion, yet neglect relative duties, and evidently commit iniquity, and are fraudulent in their dealings, and oppressive to their dependents.

V. 10—20. When professed teachers of religion contradict the word of God, it often becomes necessary, not only to answer their objections and arguments, but to point out their errors and expose their ignorance to the people; and so call on them to hear and understand the truth. It is not, however, generally expedient for us to bring any decided charge of hypocrisy against our opponents, in the manner which became the heart-searching Saviour: yet we must, by no means, put either the honour of the clerical order, or our own reputation, in competition with the glory of God and the salvation of souls. But when scribes and Pharisees are offended with plain truth; timid disciples will be disquieted, and almost disposed to think that their bolder brethren have gone too far, even though in other things they honour them: especially when they see those exasperated, whom they had hopes of conciliating. We should however remember, that nothing in religion is of any value, except what God himself has planted; nothing will endure in the soul but the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit; nothing should be admitted into the church, or be suffered to abide there, but what is of heavenly extraction: and therefore, if hypocrites be detected, false teachers offended, and professed friends changed into avowed enemies, by an open declaration of the truth, we ought not to be disconcerted: for "the trees of righteousness" will grow more fruitful, when such noxious plants are rooted up. If men quarrel with the word of Christ, we must "let them alone," and not "cast pearls before swine:" yet it is grievous to reflect how the blind have, in every age of the church, undertaken to lead the blind; and what numbers are thus continually plunging together into the pit of destruction; in which the blind leader sinks the deepest, in proportion to the degree of his pride, enmity, and presumption. Yet, as God has sometimes opened the eyes of such blind guides, and changed them into faithful teachers, we should remember still to pray for them, as well as against their wickedness.—In all our difficulties we should apply to Christ for instruction: and though he rebuke us for our want of understanding, yet he will continue to teach us, and his reproofs will tend to our humiliation and increased attention. When he teaches, he will certainly convince men, that their sin and pollution originate from themselves, and not from external causes. (Note, Jam. 1:13—15.) He will show them "the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness" of the human heart: and whilst they perceive that all the wickedness of every kind, which has filled and corrupted the earth, has been the genuine produce of depraved nature, and that it would have been tenfold greater but for merciful restraints; they will be led to see and feel, that all this exists in their own hearts, and might be educed from them by suitable temptations. He will teach them to trace all the streams of their own actual transgressions to this corrupt fountain; to watch the evil thoughts which rise within; to humble themselves for these defilements, and to seek to be cleansed from them in "the Fountain which he hath opened for sin and for uncleanness;" to consider inward sanctification as far more important than all forms and notions; and to perceive that even truth is no further valuable to them, than as it tends to purify their hearts and consciences.

V. 21—28. Our divine Saviour is "the same yesterday to-day, and for ever;" and still he sees good to vary the expressions of his love to those who wait on him. Sinners of every nation and description are alike welcome to his salvation, and he will in nowise cast out those who cry to him for mercy. Yet, he can veil the compassions of his heart under a frowning countenance; not only to humble and prove those whom he loves, but also to show the strength of their faith and the depth of their humility. In some cases, the disciples may seem more compassionate than their Lord: but when the folly and selfishness of their pity, and the wisdom and mercy of his frowns and delays, come to be compared, the case will appear far otherwise; and the event will prove that "he is rich in mercy to all them that call on him." Let then such as seek help from him, and receive no gracious answer, increase their importunity, and endeavour, with heavenly skill, to turn even their unworthiness and discouragements into arguments, with which to plead before his mercy-seat. Let sinners submit without reserve to every humiliating charge, and rely on his mercy. Thus, whilst they allow that they are not "worthy of the crumbs from his table," they may expect to be supplied with children's food: for he cannot be impoverished by his bounty to the most atrocious transgressors. Indeed, true faith gathers strength by trials, as healthy bodies do by exercise; and when the Lord has sufficiently proved the waiting soul, he will honour faith and humble perseverance, and abundantly answer every believing prayer.—We should entreat him for our children, relatives, and neighbours: especially when, through the oppression of the devil, they are incapable of seeking help for themselves: and we should never fail to intercede with him for discouraged souls.

V. 29—39. What can describe the sentiments of these happy creatures, who, without any dangerous or painful operation, found themselves in a moment restored, beyond all the efforts of nature, and beyond all the prospects of hope! With what pleasure did the ear, which had been just opened, listen to the pleasing accents of his instructive tongue! How did the lame leap around him for joy! And the maimed extend their recovered hands, in grateful acknowledgments of his new-creating power! Whilst the voice of the dumb sang forth his praises in sounds before unknown! And the eye of the blind checked the curiosity, which would have prompted it to range over the various and beautiful objects of unveiled nature, to fix its rapturous regards on the gracious countenance of Him that had given it the day. Let us further reflect, with what correspondent pleasure must our Lord survey these grateful and astonished creatures, while his benevolent heart took its share in all the delight which he gave. These trophies of his greatness! how unlike to those of the field, the monuments of desolation and slaughter!' Doddridge.—With what raptures then will they, whose souls have been restored to holiness by his healing grace, for ever contemplate and adore their divine Benefactor, and meditate on the price which he paid for their redemption! And how will he for ever behold them with immense complacency, and "delight over them to do them good!" Let us then wait on him to open our eyes that we may behold his glory; to enable us to walk in his ways and to do his will; and to teach us to show forth his praises, that the Father may be glorified in him, and in us, during life and for ever. And let us copy his example of love, according to the ability which he has given us, delighting to do good and 6 Then Jesus said unto them, [m]Take heed, and beware of [n]the leaven of [o]the Pharisees and of the Sadducees.

7 And [p]they reasoned among themselves, saying, [q]It is because we have taken no bread:

to communicate felicity.—Whilst we are willing to endure hardship, in attending to the concerns of our souls; we may be sure that our gracious Lord will compassionate us under all our troubles, and supply what he sees needful for our temporal support.—But alas! how soon do even believers forget his interpositions in their behalf! How often do we repeat our objections against self-denying and expensive duties, though we never yet were losers by them! And how frequently do our unbelieving doubts revive, under even lighter trials, after we have been delivered out of greater! Lord, "increase our faith" and pardon our unbelief; and still renew thy mercies towards us; teaching us to live upon thy fulness and bounty, for all things pertaining to this world and to that which is to come.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1—4. (Notes, Mark 8:10—13. Luke 12:54—57.) No two descriptions of bad men could be much more opposite to each other, in principles and conduct, than the Pharisees and Sadducees; yet they were alike enemies to Jesus! (Note, 3:7—10.)—'The wicked, who otherwise are at defiance one with another, can agree well together against Christ: but do what they can, Christ beareth away the victory, and triumpheth over them.' Beza.—They could find no objection against his conduct and doctrine, but what he answered to their confusion: and they therefore came insidiously to make trial of his power, again "desiring a sign from heaven," to satisfy them that he was the Messiah, of which they pleaded that his other miracles were not a sufficient proof. (Note, 12:38—40.) The descent of the Holy Spirit on him at his baptism, and the voice of the Father declaring him to be his beloved Son, were signs from heaven; yet the Pharisees and Sadducees required some further evidence: and probably they intended to mention some particular sign, or appearance in the heavens, without which they could not be convinced; purposing thus to make trial of his power. To this our Lord answered, that they were able to form conjectures what kind of weather it was likely to be, from their observations on the clouds and sky, which were generally found right: and, if they had not been hypocrites in these inquiries, they might as easily, and far more certainly, have discerned "the signs of the times." The sceptre was now departing from Judah; Daniel's seventy weeks were terminating; John the Baptist's ministry, as the predicted forerunner of the Messiah, evidenced his approach; and all the prophecies were fulfilling in his character, doctrine, and miracles: so that it was plain that these were the times of the Messiah, and that the nation was about to be given up for rejecting him. Having therefore again reproved them as a wicked and "adulterous generation," (Marg. Ref. h.) and refused them any other sign but that of Jonas, the type of his death and resurrection, he left them to their perverseness.—'O ye hypocrites, can ye prognosticate fair or foul weather, by the face of the sky? ... and can ye not, by those clear predictions of the prophets, and the miraculous demonstrations of my power, discern the time of my coming?' Bp. Hall.—'It was never known, that any one, pretending to be a prophet, laid the foundation of the truth of his pretensions upon his being despised and rejected, and even crucified as a deceiver, by them to whom he was sent, and among whom he performed all his miracles; and upon what should be done by others at his death; and upon what he should do after his resurrection.' Whitby. Yet this our Lord did repeatedly and openly, so that even his enemies were well aware of it! (27:63.)

V. 5—12. The disciples, engaged by more important concerns, had forgotten to take bread; and the fragments of their late miraculous meal being consumed, they had only one loaf remaining. Whilst uneasy on this account, Jesus, with reference to what had lately passed, warned them most cautiously to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees," and Herodians; (Mark 8:15.) meaning their hypocrisy, infidelity, corrupt doctrine, vain traditions, and proud enmity against the truth, which soured and corrupted all they did. But the disciples supposed, that he referred to their want of bread, and that he cautioned them against obtaining any from the Pharisees or Sadducees, as if they polluted every thing which they touched; and this troubled and perplexed them. Our Lord therefore, knowing of what they were discoursing, reproved their weakness of faith; seeing they might confidently have relied on his power to provide for them, if they had properly understood and kept in mind the miracles which they had recently witnessed, in the feeding of the multitudes with so small a provision, and in the quantity that was left. He also reproved them for not understanding, that he had reference to matters far more important than the leaven of bread, which, as he had before taught them, could not defile men. (Notes, 15:15—20. Mark 8:14—21.)

V. 13—16. Cesarea Philippi is supposed by some to have been the same place which had anciently been called Laish, or Dan; (Note, Judg. 18:7—10.) and it lay in the northern extremity of the land, within the Tetrarchy of Philip, Herod's brother. Philip had rebuilt this city and called it Cesarea, in honour of Tiberius Cesar, the Roman Emperor; and had added his own name to it, to distinguish it from another Cesarea, a much greater city, in a more southern part of the land, which king Herod rebuilt and called thus, in honour of Augustus Cesar. (Note, Acts 23:33—35.)—Our Lord seems to have gone thither, for the sake of retirement and discourse with his disciples: and he inquired of them, what sentiments the people entertained and expressed concerning him, who appeared as "the Son of man" among them, but who gave abundant proof that he was a very extraordinary person. To this they answered, that some, who had but lately heard of his miracles, supposed that John the Baptist was risen again; (Note, 14:1,2.) others thought he was Elijah, the forerunner of the Messiah; and others imagined he was one of the ancient prophets risen again.—Numbers thought Jesus a deceiver; but those who esteemed him more highly, had very inadequate apprehensions of his real dignity.—He then asked them what their sentiments of him were: and this was evidently the drift of the former question. To which Peter, with his usual promptitude, replied in his own name and in that of his brethren, They were assured that he was the promised Messiah, and "the Son of the living God."—The apostles had, not long before, worshipped Christ, as "the Son of God:" (Note, 14:33.) and their repeated confessions, to the same effect, show what their habitual judgment was on this subject. Some think, that they only meant to say that he was the Messiah; whereas it is obvious they thus showed, that in this respect they understood the true meaning of the prophecies concerning the Messiah. (Notes, Ps. 2:7—12. John 15:66—71. 9:35—38. 11:20—27.)

V. 17. When Peter had made this confession of his faith, our Lord immediately pronounced him blessed, or a happy man; as this knowledge and faith were not the effect of flesh ral sagacity, or human instruction, but of revelation from the Father. Others had enjoyed the same outward means; but were not yet brought to believe in Jesus "as the Christ the Son of the living God;" and the teaching of God alone had made him differ from his unbelieving countrymen: his faith and knowledge were of a spiritual and saving nature, and therefore he was blessed. Peter was, at this time, greatly ignorant of many evangelical truths, and even prejudiced against them: he did not understand the plan of "redemption by the blood of Christ;" he was but little acquainted with his own heart and with spiritual things; he had a variety of carnal and vain expectations; he was afterwards left to make many gross mistakes, yea, even to commit grievous sins, and to incur rebukes and chastenings; and he had many persecutions to endure, and was at length to die a martyr by a most painful death: yet he was "blessed," because he was regenerate, and an upright believer in Christ: having received these introductory benefits, more would in due time be given; (Note, 13:12.) and his everlasting happiness was sure.—"Revealed," does not seem, in this place, to mean the immediate communication of knowledge by inspiration; for that would not have ensured Peter's happiness: (Note, 7:21—23.) but the removing of those proud and carnal prejudices which veiled the hearts of others, that they could not understand what was in itself most plain. (Notes, 1—4. 11:25,26. 2 Cor. 3:12—16.) Peter was "taught of God;" and "his understanding" as to this subject was "opened to understand the Scriptures."

V. 18. This confession gave our Lord an occasion, with reference to the name which he had before given the apostle, (Note, John 1:35—42, v. 42.) to declare, that "on this rock he would build his church." Peter's confession contains that fundamental truth, respecting the person and offices of Christ, upon which, as on a rock, he would build his church: and on this foundation it should stand so sure, that no machinations or efforts, of devils or of men, could ever subvert it; though they should meet in council to form devices against it, and unite all their forces, and lead them forth to assault it. Nor could the powers of death, or the entrance into the eternal world, destroy the hope of those who should build on it: but one generation of believers should be raised up, as others were removed to heaven, to profess these great truths even to the end of time; and the whole company would be made more than conquerors, and be saved by the belief of them, to all eternity.—The word translated "rock," is of a similar meaning with the name of Peter, but it is not the same word. Nothing however can be more absurd, than to suppose that Christ meant, that the person of Peter was the rock on which the church should be builded; except it be the wild notion, that the bishops of Rome have since been substituted in his place! "Their rock is not as our Rock, our enemies themselves being judges." Without doubt Christ himself is the Rock and tried Foundation of the church, and wo be to him who attempts to lay any other: (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) but Peter's confession is this Rock doctrinally. The profession of the truths implied in it constitutes a man a member of the visible church; the vital belief of them constitutes a member of the real church, however he may err in other matters: but nothing less than this can entitle any one to the name of a believer. Against these doctrines, the power and policy of Satan and his servants have in every age been directed; both by exciting furious persecutions, "bringing in damnable heresies," and employing the ingenuity of plausible infidels. The Deity of Christ as "the Son of the living God," and his human nature as "the Son of Man," have by turns been opposed; and his unction to his prophetical, his priestly, and his kingly office, has been explained away by different descriptions of deceivers. Yet the church, established on the Person of Christ, as Emmanuel, the Prophet, Priest, and King of his redeemed people, still subsists; and it will assuredly, ere long, gain a decided victory over all its adversaries of every name, on earth or in hell.—Those protestant writers who contend that Peter, and he alone, was meant as the rock; and that this was a peculiar reward for his singular confession of Christ; explain themselves to mean, that Peter was honoured to lay the first foundation of the Christian church, both among the Jews and the Gentiles; and perhaps our Lord might refer to this peculiar distinction. (Acts 2:10.) But to lay a foundation, and to be a foundation, are widely different things; and certainly Peter was the foundation of the church in no other sense than the rest of the apostles were. (Marg. Ref. p.—Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. Rev. 21:9—21, v. 14.)—Much pains have also been taken, to show that "the gates of hell," or Hades, the invisible world, do not mean, according to the common interpretation, the power and policy of the devil and of his angels and servants; but merely death, as the entrance into Hades; and that a resurrection of all true believers to eternal life is especially intended. But Christ came, not only "to overcome death, but him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil," and this at last brings in the substance of the more usual and far more ancient interpretation.—'Hades here ... signifies death, or grave, or destruction, and by consequence Satan also, who hath the power of these. ... Gates may signify, first, power, ... which consists in arms, ... which were usually kept over the gates of the cities: secondly, counsel, contrivance, stratagems, policy; because they were wont to sit in council in the gates: thirdly, worldly authority borrowed by Satan from his instruments, the heathen powers of the world, because judgment was wont to be exercised in the gates. ... Not all the power, ... policy, ... authority ... in the world, no, not death or grave, (which are proverbially irresistible, Cant. 8:6.) nor Satan himself, shall be able to destroy this fabric. ... "The church" signifies particular persons, (believers, true faithful Christians,) of which the church consists, or ... the whole congregation and society of men. ... Though Christians shall die, yet death shall have no dominion over them: Christ shall break open those bars.—As it refers to the church in complexo, that is, to the whole congregation of Christian professors; so it signifies a promise from Christ, that it shall never be destroyed so as to perish totally, but whatever change it undergoes in the world, it shall again lift up the head, and have as it were its resurrection: which promise is performed, if, as it decays ... in one ... part, it revive and flourish in another.' Hammond. The original word signifies any assembly of people, for whatever purpose, or in whatever way collected: but in the New Testament it is generally used in the senses above given.—Considered as a prophecy, this has been most wonderfully accomplished, during almost eighteen hundred years, during a vast proportion of which, the professed friends of the church have combined with her avowed enemies to destroy her, by power and policy, by persecution and heresies, and by every imaginable way; but all in vain.—"The gates of hell" have not prevailed, and shall not prevail against her.—"Heaven and earth shall pass away, but Christ's words shall not pass away."—Let it be remarked, that our Lord says, "I will build, &c." but the church is "God's building and his church." (1 Cor. 3:9.)

V. 19. Our Lord next stated the authority with which Peter would be invested. He had spoken in the name of his brethren, as well as in his own; and doubtless this related to them as well as to him: (18:18.) but he might be especially addressed, as he first preached the gospel, after Christ's ascension, both to the Jews and to the Gentiles; thus opening the kingdom of heaven, as it were, to them both, in which it was impossible that any successor could share with him.—Keys were an ancient emblem of authority. (Rev. 3:7,8, Note, Is. 22:20—25.) The expression doubtless immediately related to the authority which the apostles possessed, as the representatives of Christ, and the principal ministers of his kingdom. (Note, John 20:19—23, v. 23.) They were endued with the Holy Spirit, that they might infallibly declare his truth to mankind, and determine what was binding on the conscience, and what not; to show what persons ought to be admitted into the church, or excluded from it; to decide on the characters of those whose sins were forgiven, or the contrary: and whatever in these, and similar respects, they bound or loosed on earth would be bound or loosed in heaven. The apostles themselves had not an infallible insight into the characters of men, and they were liable to mistakes and sins whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.

20 Then [s]charged he his disciples, that they should tell no man that he was [a]Jesus the Christ.

[Practical Observations.]

21 ¶ From that time forth [b]began Jesus to show unto his disciples, how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and [c]chief priests and scribes, and be killed, [d]and be raised again the third day.

22 Then Peter took him, and [e]began to rebuke him, saying, [f]Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee.

23 But he turned, and said unto Peter, [g]Get thee behind me, [h]Satan: [b]thou art an offence unto me; for [i]thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men.

24 Then said Jesus unto his disciples, [k]If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, [l]and take up his cross, and follow me.

25 For [m]whosoever will save his life shall lose it: and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it.

26 For [n]what is a man profited, if he shall [c]gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? [o]or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

in their own conduct. But they were infallibly preserved from error, in stating the way of acceptance and salvation, the rule of obedience, the believer's character and experience, and the final doom of unbelievers, hypocrites, and apostates. In such things their decision was absolute, and ratified in heaven, as all will find at last, even they who now despise it. In this respect, their apostolical authority continues in their doctrine, as transmitted to us in the New Testament: but all other ministers, of whatever rank, name, or age, can do no more than declare the doctrine of the apostles, and apply it to particular cases; by preaching the word, administering divine ordinances, admitting men into the visible church, or excluding them from it, or by personal encouragement and warning. As far as they proceed according to the Scripture in these things, their decisions are warranted and ratified in heaven: but not when they mistake, either in doctrine, or in its application to particular persons or characters. As no man can see another's heart; and as no man has any inherent power to forgive sin, or the contrary: so all pretensions absolutely to absolve, or to retain men's sins, claim more than even apostolical authority: for surely none will maintain that any man can be made a true believer, or a hypocrite, by the erroneous decision of another concerning him.—'We say, that Christ hath given to his ministers power to bind, to loose, to open, to shut, and that the office of loosing consisteth in this: either (1.) that the minister, by the preaching of the Gospel offereth the merits of Christ and full pardon to such as have lowly and contrite hearts, and do unfeignedly repent themselves; pronouncing unto the same a sure and undoubted forgiveness of their sins, and hope of everlasting salvation: or else, (2.) that the same minister, when any have offended their brother's minds, with some great offence or notable and open crime, whereby they have, as it were, banished, and made themselves strangers from the common fellowship, and from the body of Christ, then, after perfect amendment of such persons, doth reconcile them, and bring them home again, and restore them to the company and unity of the faithful.—We say also, that the minister doth execute the authority of binding and shutting, (1.) as often as he shutteth up the gate of the kingdom of heaven against unbelieving and stubborn persons, denouncing unto them God's vengeance and everlasting punishment. Or else, (2.) when he doth shut them out from the bosom of the church by open excommunication.—Out of doubt, what sentence soever the minister of God shall give in this sort, God himself doth so well allow it, that whatsoever here on earth is loosed and bound, God himself will loose and bind, and confirm the same in heaven.—And, touching the keys, wherewith they may either open or shut the kingdom of heaven, we, with Chrysostom say, they may be the knowledge of the Scriptures: with Tertullian we say, the interpretation of the law, (or word of God,) and with Eusebius, we call them the word of God.' Bp. Jewel.

V. 20. Our Lord having opened these things in confidence to his disciples, charged them not to speak to others concerning his being the Messiah. Let them collect it from the fulfilment of prophecy, and from his miracles and doctrine: but the time for an explicit declaration of it was not yet come.

V. 21—23. It is probable that the apostles were at this time fully expecting their Lord's appearing in external glory, as "the King of Israel;" but, on the contrary, he began to show them more openly than before, that he must go up to Jerusalem, to suffer many things from those in authority, and even to be put to death; but that on the third day he should rise again. (Notes, 17—19. Mark 10:32—34. Luke 24:26—31.) Thus he proceeded to bring them acquainted with his priestly office; and to prepare their minds for those trying scenes, which they were about to witness. But Peter, who had overlooked all those prophecies which related to the Messiah's sufferings, and who probably was elated by the commendation bestowed on him, took him aside, or by the hand, and with a mixture of affection and ignorance, expressed to him his desire and hope, that it should not be so with him. The words are rendered by some, 'Spare thyself;' by others, 'Mercy be unto thee;' or 'I hope and pray thou wilt be more favourably dealt with, and that this shall not happen to thee.' Our version, however, seems very fairly to give the true import of them. Thus Peter soon showed how unfit he was to be the rock, on which the church was to be builded. Accordingly Christ turned, and rebuked him in the very terms which he had used in repelling the devil's temptations. (Luke 4:8.) Some wish to soften the apparent harshness of the expression: but doubtless Christ intended to show, that on this occasion Satan spake by Peter, and used him (without Peter's intention) as an instrument in tempting Jesus to shun the cross. It was therefore proper to recognise Satan, as well as Peter, in the suggestion. Satan tempted Christ by Peter, as he did Eve by the serpent, and Adam by Eve. Thus Peter was "an offence," or stumbling-block, to Jesus; for in this instance he spake as a carnal man, who did not properly value, or relish, the spiritual excellency of divine things; but was more disposed to prize and choose the things of men, such as ease, indulgence, honour, and riches, than to understand the doctrine of redemption and the glory of God in it.

V. 24—28. Our Lord next proceeded to remind the apostles what they must expect in following him. (Note, 10:37—39.) He was, indeed, shortly to enter into his glory; but if any of them purposed to come thither after him, and to share the privileges of his kingdom, he must first learn from his example to "deny himself, take up his cross," and follow him: he must habituate himself to give a flat denial to the most clamorous solicitations of his pride, ambition, avarice, and carnal self-love; and to inure every selfish and sensual inclination to submission. (Note, Luke 9:18—27, v. 23.) He must also be prepared in mind, to take up and carry his cross, as a condemned person, to the place of execution; determined rather to be nailed to it, and there expire, than to renounce his Lord, who had thus suffered an excruciating and ignominious death for his sins. And if any man should determine to save his life, even by denying Christ, he would certainly forfeit the eternal life of his soul; which was ensured to those that should lay down their lives for his sake. To this, Jesus subjoined two most interesting questions, which are supposed to have been proverbial among the Jews. What would that man be profited, who should gain the possession of the whole world, all its riches, power, and splendour, but at the same time should in doing it lose his own life? Or what could be deemed an adequate price to be given a man in exchange for his life, if that should be lost or forfeited? If then all worldly things were worthless when compared with temporal life: how forcibly must the same argument conclude in respect of the soul, and its state of eternal happiness or misery! If a man should save his life, and gain the whole world by apostacy from Christ, and thus lose the happiness, and ensure the destruction of his soul, where would be his gain? (Note, Mark 8:32—37, v. 36, 37.) Or, with what would he endeavour to redeem his forfeited felicity, or to rescue his soul from deserved misery? The Saviour indeed, at this time, appeared as "the Son of man," in a state of humiliation, and was about to set them an example of constancy in holy obedience and of patient suffering even unto death. But he assured them, that he would at length appear "in the glory of his Father," displaying the divine perfections of power, wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy; exercising sovereign authority over all creatures; and attended with the holy angels as his servants; then he would graciously reward his disciples for all their self-denying services and patient sufferings for his sake, and execute righteous vengeance on his enemies: thus rendering to believers and unbelievers, according to their works. And though this event was distant, yet verily some there present would certainly be preserved from death, notwithstanding all persecutions, till they saw him come to set up his kingdom in a glorious manner. This referred especially to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, when Christ came in his kingdom to destroy his most inveterate enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Ungodly men, of discordant sentiments and parties, are united under one common head, and engaged in one common opposition to the cause of Christ: and infidels, Pharisees, and time-servers, often postpone their subordinate controversies, that they may join their subtlety and influence in opposing the word of God. Men frequently discover great ingenuity and sagacity, they make accurate observations, and deduce just inferences, in matters of a temporal nature: yet when they turn their minds to religious subjects, they seem incapable of understanding the plainest truths, which run counter to their interests, passions, and prejudices. And many are constrained to act on probable evidence, in their most important secular concerns, who perversely demand demonstration in every thing relating to religion, nay, refuse to be satisfied with demonstration itself! But Christ will convict such disingenuous prevaricators; and, in the mean time, it is commonly best for us to leave them, and not to waste our time, or give them a handle, by disputing with them.—We ought not indeed allowedly to neglect our temporal concerns, in attending to those of our souls; yet if any are betrayed into it occasionally, through great earnestness about spiritual things, they need not fear but the Lord will provide for them. Our main concern should be, to beware of false teachers and false doctrine; and to avoid the leaven of hypocrisy, pride, and infidelity, which diffuse their baneful influence on every side: yet even disciples are sometimes more anxious concerning the supply of their wants, than about keeping at a distance from error and sin. This arises from weakness of faith, and will expose them to rebukes.—Should the Lord interrogate us, under many of our despondings, concerning our past experience of his power, truth, and love, he would soon show us what cause we have to be ashamed of our present distrust and solicitude: and force us to confess that we did not properly understand and remember his former interpositions in our favour. But it is well, if we learn to profit by our own dulness and mistakes, and are made more attentive to his instructions.

V. 13—20. We often foolishly want to know what men say of us, expecting perhaps some flattering report: and this commonly tends to our vexation, or acts as a temptation to resentment or discontent: but our blessed Lord had wise, holy, and important reasons for making a similar inquiry; and we ought to imitate his manner of grafting instructive observations on every topic of conversation.—There are various opinions concerning the Lord Jesus; and they who think the most honourably of him, come nearest to the truth: but none can be his true disciples, who hesitate to confess, "that he is the Christ, the Son of the living God," or who labour to explain away the meaning of such emphatical words. Happy are they, who confess this from an understanding and believing heart! Whatever may be their present errors and infirmities, or their future trials and temptations, they certainly are specially favoured by the Lord: for human teaching alone has not given them this knowledge of the truth, but it is the gift of their heavenly Father, and an earnest of further favours.—We should learn to make candid allowances for inquirers who seem to have an honest and teachable spirit, but are yet strangers to many important truths; for not the doctrines known and believed, but the origin, nature, and effects of their faith and knowledge, distinguish the true disciples from other men.—The Person and work of Christ, the Son of God, is the Rock on which alone the church is built; and let the powers of darkness plot and rage, let infidels and heretics revile and menace as they please, they will never be able to subvert this foundation, or to destroy one soul which rests his hope upon it.—We have not at present such authority as was intrusted to the apostles, and none can forgive sins but God only; yet let no man despise the declarations and censures of faithful ministers: for as far as they agree with the word of God, they are ratified in heaven; whether they pronounce the penitent and believing to be fully pardoned, or the unbelieving and hypocritical to remain under the wrath of God.

V. 21—28. We ought not so to regard one part of the Redeemer's character, as to overlook another; but should keep in view at once, the depth of his voluntary humiliation and sufferings as our great High-Priest, and the height of his exaltation as our glorious King. In like manner, we should connect our view of the believer's privileges with that of his duty, and of the cross which he must bear in the way to glory. But it often happens, that men speak so excellently of one part of Christianity, as to be entitled to commendation; and yet betray their ignorance and carnal prejudices, when they give their sentiments on other subjects, and so lay themselves open to deserved rebukes. Those who would dissuade us from self-denying duties, or set us against the cross which lies in our path, and would counsel us to turn aside, in order to shun it, ought in that respect to be considered as adversaries; and in all carnal counsellors we should recognise the voice of Satan, whose policy it is to tempt us by those whom we love, and who are in other things most worthy of our esteem. We must not parley with such as "are an offence to us," but decidedly reject their solicitations: showing them that their false tenderness springs from their "savouring," not the "things of God, but those of men."—But what repeated instructions do we need, to teach us to deny ourselves, and to copy the example of our suffering Redeemer; and to convince us, that every disciple must have the spirit of a martyr, whether it ever be put to the trial or not!—If life is so valuable, that the whole world is a paltry compensation for the loss of it, and unworthy to be given in exchange for it, what words can describe, or computation reach, the worth of an immortal soul? It is the noblest work of God below, formed at first in his own image, possessed of vast and most valuable powers, capable of most exquisite happiness or misery, and intended for eternal existence. Such an invaluable treasure every man is possessed of; but how few seem sensible of its preciousness, or of the danger of losing it! This loss consists in the final and eternal forfeiture of the favour of God, in deprivation of his image, and banishment from his presence in the regions of darkness, misery, and despair. The souls of all men are in themselves thus lost, by transgression of the holy law of our Creator; yet through the mercy of the Lord Jesus, none will eventually perish, but the impenitent and unbelieving. Could any man therefore obtain the whole world, and the sure enjoyment of it during a thousand years, as his recompense for neglecting the salvation of the gospel; he would, through the countless ages of eternity, curse his own folly, in making so mad a bargain. Yet millions lose their souls for the sake of the most trivial gain, or the most worthless indulgence, nay, from mere sloth and negligence! for whatever the object be for which men refuse or forsake Christ, that is the price at which Satan purchases their souls. But alas! we are all propense to believe the soothing lies of that cruel murderer and his emissaries, and to disbelieve the alarming truths of God and his ministers: we are disposed to procrastinate, or to take it for granted that all is well, when it is far otherwise;,and therefore men lose their souls for "a thing of naught."—But what can they give in exchange for them? Alas! death reduces the wealthiest sinner to the level of the meanest beggar, and he has naught to give. The dying transgressor, however wealthy, cannot, with all his treasure, perhaps acquired by iniquity, purchase one hour's respite, in order to seek the mercy of his offended God. The whole world in this case is of no value: "it cost more to redeem the soul, and that must be let alone for ever" by all who neglect the precious ransom which the Saviour once paid, when "he gave himself for us, to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify us to himself, a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Let us then learn to value our souls, and Christ as the Saviour of ruined souls; and to despise every glittering bait, and every formidable danger, by which Satan would allure or fright us from our only refuge. Let us fear coming short of this salvation, and continually anticipate the season, when "the Son of Man shall come in the glory o

CHAPTER XVII.

The transfiguration of Christ, who discourses with Moses and Elias before Peter, James, and John, 1—8. He charges them not to make it known; and instructs them concerning the coming of Elias, 9—13. He casts out an evil spirit, and reproves the unbelief of the people and of his disciples, 14—21. He foretells his death and resurrection, 22, 23; and pays tribute with money obtained by miracle, 24—27.

AND [a]after six days Jesus taketh [b]Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into [c]an high mountain apart,

2 And was [d]transfigured before them: and [e]his face did shine as the sun, and his [f]raiment was white as the light.

3 And, [g]behold, there appeared unto them [h]Moses and [i]Elias, talking with him.

4 Then [k]answered Peter, and said unto Jesus, Lord, [l]it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.

5 While he yet spake, [m]behold, a bright cloud overshadowed them: and behold, [n]a voice out of the cloud, which said, [o]This is my beloved Son, [p]in whom I am well pleased; [q]hear ye him.

6 And when the disciples heard it, [r]they fell on their face, and were sore afraid.

7 And Jesus came and [s]touched them, and said, [t]Arise, and be not afraid.

8 And when they had lifted up their eyes, [u]they saw no man, save Jesus only.

his Father, and all his holy angels with him, to reward every man according to his works:" for he will mercifully recompense the fruits of his own grace in us, and all our losses and sufferings for his sake: "but if any man draw back, his soul will have no pleasure in him." Though our trials must come first: yet they will soon be over: we shall speedily behold our once suffering Saviour in his glory, and our transient taste of death will introduce us into "his presence, where is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore."

NOTES.—CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.) The evangelists Matthew and Mark place this event six days after the discourse of the preceding chapter, as six whole days intervened; but St. Luke, taking in both the day of the discourse, and that of the transfiguration, says that it was eight days after. (Luke 9:28.)—Our Lord retired to a mountain apart to pray, where he spent the night, as he did on some other occasions: (Note, Luke 6:12.) tradition reports that it was Tabor, a lofty mountain to the north of Galilee. He was pleased to take with him Peter, James, and John, but not the other apostles, because it "seemed good in his sight;" for we cannot assign any other satisfactory reason. The same apostles had witnessed the resurrection of Jairus's daughter, and they afterwards attended him in his agony in the garden. (26:37. Mark 5:37.) There was a competent number to prove the fact, and more were unnecessary. While engaged in prayer, "he was transfigured," or metamorphosed, before them. The apostles saw their Master daily in "the form of a servant," and as the Son of Man; but on this occasion, they "beheld his glory, as of the Only begotten of the Father," and had such a discovery of him "in the form of God," as they were able to sustain. (Note, Phil. 2:9—11.) His disguise was, as it were, laid aside, and he appeared like himself: "the Sun of Righteousness," "the Light of the world," shone forth from behind those clouds which commonly obscured his splendour. "The fashion of his countenance was altered," and "did shine like the sun;" and his very "raiment became white as snow, so as no fuller on earth could whiten it;" (Mark 9:3.) yea, "white as the light," and resplendent as lightning. This appearance of Christ, as Man, would give the apostles some faint conception of the divine glory which he had with the Father before his incarnation, and which was always inherent in him, though he saw good to veil it under external meanness. It would serve to interpret to them the meaning of their own confession, "thou art the Son of the living God:" it was intended to support their faith, at that approaching season when they would witness his crucifixion: and it would give them an idea of his heavenly glory after his ascension; and of the glory prepared for them also, when changed by his power to be like him, even in respect of his glorified body. (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:45—49. Phil. 3:20,21.)

Was transfigured. (2) Μετεμορφωθη. Mark 9:2. Rom. 12:2. 2 Cor. 3:18.—'Μεταμορφοομαι, novam formam sumo, personam planè aliam induo, transfiguror, transformor; ex μετα, trans, et μορφοω, formo, à μορφη, forma.' Schleusner. Μορφη. Mark 16:12. Phil. 2:6,7.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) In addition to the personal glory which our Lord at this time manifested, there appeared Moses and Elijah conversing with him, on the subject of the painful and ignominious death which he was shortly to suffer at Jerusalem. (Notes, Luke 9:28—36, v. 31.) The apostles, hearing at least part of this conversation, probably understood from it, that the persons whom they saw were Moses and Elijah. Elijah was taken up alive into heaven, and doubtless appeared in his glorified body: how Moses appeared is no proper subject for our inquiry; but, as Christ rose "the first fruits" of all who rise to die no more, there is no ground for the notion, that the body of Moses was raised for the very purpose.—This scene was suited to give the apostles a realizing apprehension of the invisible world, and of the present felicity of departed believers, to which they would immediately be admitted, if "faithful unto death." These two eminent persons attended on Jesus, as servants on their Lord, coming, as it were, on purpose to do him homage; glorious indeed, but with glory far beneath His; as the planets are less resplendent than the noonday sun, from whom they derive their lustre, and by whose beams they are eclipsed. Moses was the great lawgiver of Israel, and Elijah the chief of the prophets; but they both came, to lay down their commissions and their honours at the Redeemer's feet; in whose person, and obedience unto death, the moral law was magnified, the ceremonial types were fulfilled, the prophecies were accomplished, and the end of all preceding dispensations answered. Thus Moses and Elijah bare witness to the apostles, that Jesus was their Lord also; and that by his coming, the time of the law and the prophets was terminated, and that of the gospel introduced. (Notes, Mark 9:2—10. John 1:16—18. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)

V. 4. With this glorious scene before their eyes, the apostles were heavy with sleep, either overpowered by the splendour, or drowsy through weariness: (Luke 9:32.) but when they were awaked, Peter, delighted and surprised to see his beloved Master "appear in glory," and receive such honour, instead of hearkening to the discourse, broke out into an exclamation, that it was most pleasant and desirable for them to continue there, and not to go down any more to meet those sufferings, of which he was so reluctant to hear. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, 16:24—28, vv. 22, 23.) He therefore proposed to erect on the mountain three tents, for Jesus, Moses, and Elijah: but in this he knew not what he said. (Mark 9:6 Luke 9:33.) That sacrifice was not yet offered, without which his sinful soul could not have been saved; and most important services were appointed to him and his brethren, for the glory of God, and the good of the church, in all succeeding ages. Peter, on this occasion also, "savoured the things of men," and was not meet for the spiritual felicity to which he aspired; and he seems to have forgotten the other disciples who were left below, from a regard to his own present ease and comfort. He however scarcely understood the meaning of his own proposal, which was rather the language of his feelings, than of his understanding. (Notes, John 13:36—38, v. 37. 2 Pet. 1:12—18.)

V. 5—8. While Peter was speaking, "a bright cloud overshadowed them;" an emblem of the divine presence and glory, but so veiled as to suit their mortal state: yet it was not like the tremendous display from mount Sinai at the giving of the law, nor like the thick darkness by which the Lord took possession of the temple: but "a bright cloud," denoting the introduction of a clearer and more encouraging discovery of the divine glory by the gospel. (Marg. Ref. m.) From this cloud, a voice was distinctly heard, which coincided with the testimony borne to Jesus at his baptism; the eternal Father declaring "him to be his well-beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased." (Note, 3:16,17, v. 17.) To this was added a command to them to "hear him," to receive his instructions in obedient faith, even in preference to Moses and the prophets, whose external appointments he would supersede or alter. This glorious vision astonished and terrified the apostles; and they fell prostrate in adoration and dismay, and lay till Jesus came to encourage them; when arising and looking around, they found that the vision was departed, and their Lord left alone with them in his usual appearance; save that, it is probable, some lustre still continued in his countenance, even after they went down from the mount. (Marg. Ref. n—u. Notes, Mark 9:2—10, vv. 7,8. Luke 9:28—36, vv. 34—36.)

V. 9. As Jesus came down, the next day, to the other apostles and the people, he charged those with him not to mention the instructive and animating scene which they had witnessed, till after his resurrection from the dead; for before that event it would not have obtained credit: and it was, for the present, rather intended for their own support and encouragement, than for the conviction of others. It seems that the other disciples were included in this general charge, so that it must not be mentioned even to them.—(Marg Ref. x. y. Mark 9:9,10. Note, 2 Pet. 1:16—19.)

The vision.] Το ὁραμα, ab οραω, to see.—'Α ειδον. Mark 9:9. Ουδεν ὡν ἑωρακασιν. Luke 9:36.)

[x]Jesus charged them, saying, Tell the vision to no man, [y]until the Son of man be risen again from the dead.

10 And his disciples asked him, saying, [z]Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?

11 And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, [a]and restore all things:

12 But I say unto you, That Elias is come already, [b]and they knew him not, [c]but have done unto him whatsoever they listed: [d]likewise shall also the Son of man suffer of them.

13 Then [e]the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ And [f]when they were come to the multitude, there came to him a certain man, [g]kneeling down to him, and saying,

15 Lord, [h]have mercy on my son; [i]for he is lunatic, and sore vexed: [k]for oft-times he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water.

16 And I brought him to thy disciples, [l]and they could not cure him.

17 Then Jesus answered and said, [m]O faithless and perverse generation, [n]how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him hither to me.

18 And Jesus [o]rebuked the devil, and he departed out of him: and the child was cured [p]from that very hour.

19 Then [q]came the disciples to Jesus apart, and said, Why could not we cast him out?

20 And Jesus said unto them, [r]Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, [s]If ye have faith as [t]a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and [u]nothing shall be impossible unto you.

21 Howbeit [x]this kind goeth not out [y]but by prayer and fasting.

22 And while they abode in Galilee, Jesus said unto them, [z]The Son of man shall be [a]betrayed into the hands of men;

23 And [b]they shall kill him, and [c]the third day he shall be raised again. [d]And they were exceeding sorry.

24 ¶ And [e]when they were come to Capernaum,

V. 10—13. The apostles, being fully convinced that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that he would speedily set up his glorious kingdom, were nevertheless unable to reconcile these things with the doctrine of the scribes; that Elias, or Elijah, "must first come;" especially as it was grounded on an express prophecy in Malachi. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Mal. 3:1—4, v. 1. 4:2—6.)—Perhaps they supposed that the appearance of Elijah on the mount was intended; and in that case, why must they conceal it? To this our Lord replied, that it had doubtless been predicted that Elijah would come, and restore or regulate all things, in order to prepare the way for the Messiah's kingdom; but that in fact he had come, and the people and scribes had not known or believed him, and at length he had been put to death by the malice of his enemies: and in like manner they would also persecute and slay their promised Messiah, as it had been predicted by the prophets. —By this the disciples more clearly perceived that John the Baptist had been foretold under the name of Elijah, because of the similarity of his disposition and ministerial labours. (Notes, 11:7—15.)—'He shall finish, or perform, establish, settle all things; both perform all that was prophesied of Elias at his coming, and close and shut up the first state of the world, that of the Mosaical economy, making entrance, as a harbinger, on the second, that of the Messias. In this sense it is that it is said, "the law and the prophets were until John," noting him to be the conclusion and shutting up, finishing and closing, of that state; and that was to be the office of Elias, under whose name John was prefigured.' Hammond.—'The scribes and Pharisees "have done to him whatsoever they listed," rejecting his baptism, (Luke 7:30.) and refusing to believe his doctrine, (21:25.) ... or to own him as a prophet from God, saying that "he had a devil." ... And it is probable, that both they and the Sadducees did this, because he had styled them "a generation of vipers." (3:7.) And though we do not read that they gave occasion either to his imprisonment or to his death, yet may we reasonably conceive, that they who thus thought and spake of him, were well pleased at it; ... it being not for fear of them, but only of the multitude who accounted him as a prophet, that Herod, for a season, was restrained from killing him.' Whithy on Mark 9:13.—(*Marg. V. 19, 20. The apostles had doubtless in some instances cast out devils, but being baffled at this time, they inquired the reason of their disappointment. To this Jesus replied that it was wholly owing to their unbelief. Perhaps they had been discouraged in the attempt, by an apprehension of the difficulty of the case: they had not, however, that simple and entire reliance on the power and promise of Christ which was requisite. For if this had been the case, though their faith had been small, and apparently inadequate to the effect, like a grain of mustard-seed, they might, had that been necessary, have removed the mountain before them; as nothing could be impossible to the almighty power which faith engaged on their side.—'By "faith as a grain of mustard-seed," (13:31.) ... some understand a faith that groweth and increaseth as a grain of mustard-seed. ... Christ elsewhere, for "the removing of a mountain," ... (21:21.) requires ... "faith in God," (Mark 11:22,23.) which seems to signify an excelling faith, "faith without doubting." ... St. Paul reckons faith able "to remove mountains," as the strongest faith. (1 Cor. 13:2.) ... According to this exposition, the sense runs thus: Did your faith increase, according to the examples of God's power you have had before your eyes; as the grain of mustard-seed grows up to be the greatest of all herbs, so would your faith transmount and grow superior to all difficulties.—A remover of mountains seems only to import ... a doer of those things which are exceeding difficult, and beyond the power of nature to perform.' Whitby.—Both these expressions seem to have been taken from proverbs commonly used at that time, and therefore more fully understood by our Lord's hearers than they are by us. 'Thus the Rabbies say, The globe of the earth is but as a grain of mustard-seed, when compared with the expanse of the heavens.' Dod dridge. (Marg. Ref. s—u.)

V. 21. This seems clearly to intimate, that there are different orders of evil spirits, some more powerful and malignant than others; (12:45.) and that these could not be cast out, except by persons who were much engaged in fasting and prayer. As success depended on the strength and simplicity of faith, "fasting and prayer" may be considered as proper means for increasing humility, zeal, compassion, and those holy affections of the soul, with which vigorous and simple faith must be intimately connected: and the spirit of the instruction is equally applicable to us, in our personal conflicts and public services.—'Because devotion is apt to grow dull and faint, there must be an exercise of fasting and abstinence, to put an edge upon it, and to stir it up.' Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. Mark 9:29,30.—Note, 9:14,15.)

V. 24—27. The tribute here mentioned seems to have been the half-shekel apiece, which was collected to defray the expense of the service of the sanctuary.—Marg. Notes, Ex. 30: 11—16. 2 Kings 12:4,5. Neh. 10:32,33.) This at first was collected occasionally, as wanted; but we are informed by Josephus, that in his time it was paid annually, by all above twenty years of age.—Peter, when asked if his master did not pay this tribute, answered at once, that he did; knowing they that received tribute-money came to Peter, and said, Doth not your Master pay tribute?

25 He saith, [f]Yes. And when he was come into the house, Jesus prevented him, saying, What thinkest thou, Simon? of whom do the kings of the earth take custom or tribute? [g]of their own children, or of strangers?

26 Peter saith unto him, Of strangers. Jesus saith unto him, Then are the children free.

27 Notwithstanding, [h]lest we should offend them, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, [i]and take up the fish that first cometh up: and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find [k]a piece of money: [k]that take, and give unto them for me and thee.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Jesus teaches humility by the emblem of a little child, 1—4. He inculcates attention to his "little ones," and watchfulness against stumbling others, or falling ourselves, 5—10. He ill strates his care of his people, by the parable of a lost sheep, 11—14; shows how to act toward is an offending brother, 15—17; assures the apostles that what they bind or loose shall be bound or loosed in heaven, 18; gives special promises to those who unite in prayer, or meet in his name, 19, 20; and enforces the constant forgiveness of injuries, by a parable of a king, and his dealings with a servant, who was deeply indebted to him; yet was not influenced by his readiness to forgive him, to forgive his fellow-servant, 21—35.

AT [a]the same time came the disciples unto Jesus, saying, [b]Who is the greatest [c]in the kingdom of heaven?

him to be ready for every act of piety and equity. But Jesus, preventing his mention of the subject by showing that he knew what had passed, asked him, of whom kings were accustomed to levy taxes; whether of their own children, or of strangers. Children, in this connexion, must be understood literally, and strangers must mean the children of others: for kings generally collect taxes from their subjects, though their own families be exempted. By this question he intimated that as "the Son of God," the Lord of the temple, (and in this character the Jews ought to have recognised and welcomed him,) he had no right to contribute to the expenses there incurred, for the benefit of those, who in themselves were strangers and enemies.—'Our Saviour's argument, why he should not pay this tribute, as being the Son of that King to whom it was paid, holds not with reference to the other tribute paid to Cæsar, he being not the Son of Cæsar, but of God.' Whithy. Lest, however, any should take offence at his refusal, as if regardless of the temple-worship, he waived his privilege: and, as he had no money, he ordered Peter to cast a hook into the sea, which was close by; and assured him that in the mouth of the first fish which he caught, he should find a piece of money, containing a shekel of silver, which would suffice for them both.—'By which example Christ teacheth us to avoid the scandal and sinister suspicions of men, though they be groundless, with some detriment to ourselves, especially when we have not means to convince them....The scandal of the Pharisees, proceeding not from ignorance but pure malice, he is not thus concerned to avoid. (15:12.)' Whithy. (Marg. Ref. h.)—The external poverty of Christ, contrasted with this display of divine glory, must sensibly affect every considerate mind. By whatever means this piece of money was lodged in the mouth of the fish, omniscience alone could discover it there, and omnipotence ensure its being first brought to Peter's hook. Had Jesus so pleased, all the treasures in the depths of the sea, and in the heart of the earth, might with equal ease have been laid at his feet. His poverty was therefore voluntary, as our suffering Surety; to take away the reproach of an indigent station, and to reconcile his people to it, as best and safest for them. —The other disciples, it is probable, paid the tribute, either in the several cities where they had lived, or at some other time. —A piece of money. (27) "A stater." Marg. The stater was equal to two didrachmas; (24. marg.) or of the same value as a shekel.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Discoveries of the Redeemer's divine majesty greatly assist us, in rightly understanding the motive, the benefit, and the glory of his abasement. Could we now behold that sacred countenance, which once, for our sins, was disfigured with blood and spitting, we should view it more resplendent than the meridian sun. We should see the Saviour no longer "crowned with thorns," insulted with the purple robe, and nailed to the cross between two robbers: but "arrayed with light as a garment," and surrounded with the adoring throng of prophets, apostles, saints, and angels, emulating each other, who should most rapturously celebrate his praises: yea, we should hear the eternal Father, from the inaccessible light in which he dwells, invisible, proclaim the honours of the Redeemer as his coequal Son, and regard himself as glorified in all the adorations rendered to him. (Notes, John 5:20—23, v. 23. Phil. 2:9—11, v. 11.) But alas! how dull and drowsy are our minds, when we would contemplate such subjects!—If, however, by faith we get a glimpse of our Redeemer's glory, and our hearts glow with love and joy; we find our heaven begun, and we are ready to say, "It is good for us to be here;" and we want always to continue in that pleasant frame of spirit, and to spend our lives in contemplation. But we know not what we say or do: even in this there is a large proportion of carnal self-love; some knowledge indeed of the essence of felicity; but great ignorance of what is needful to fit us for it, and of the situation in which we are placed during our continuance here. These glimpses and foretastes are vouchsafed to prepare us for tribulations, and to support us under them; but we must pass through varying experiences in our way to glory, and spend our lives in self-denying services, for the honour of Christ and the benefit of his people.—We know not what we shall at last be: yet we are assured, that when the Saviour shall appear, we shall be like him; and as our bodies must be changed by his omnipotence, so must our souls be transfigured and transformed by his renewing grace. This should be our grand personal object, whilst we wait for the time, when he "will receive us to himself, that where he is there we may be also." In order to this, we must obediently hear him as our Prophet and King; trust in him as the great Mediator, "in whom" the Father "is well pleased;" and wait for the communication of his grace, in fervent prayer, and retirement from the hurry of this vain world.—But we could not now endure the refulgence of the divine glory: not only the terrors of mount Sinai, but the glories of mount Tabor, would overwhelm us; save for the gracious interposition, and encouraging words, of the incarnate Saviour.—After sweet seasons of communion with God, we must return to our several employments, yet the Saviour will be with us, if we rely on his promises and are observant of his precepts; and we should ever keep in mind his death and resurrection, and anticipate the time, when we shall behold him in glory, and be for ever with him.—But even with the Scriptures in our hands, how apt are we to overlook the accomplishments of them! And how little in comparison has yet been effected, in bringing fallen sinners unto God, by the labours of all his servants! Men knew not the Son of the Father, but crucified and slew him; and we need not wonder, if they treat his disciples and ministers in the same manner.

V. 14—27. Manifold are the troubles of body and mind, personal and domestic, to which we are liable, by the power of Satan, and for our sins: but, through the goodness of our God, hitherto we have not been destroyed, though sorely vexed and endangered; and if our troubles bring us humbly to seek help from Christ, they will eventually be "for our profit." We may do right in applying to disciples, and they may be desirous to help us, though often unable: nothing, however, but our unbelief and disobedience, can preclude us from finding relief in Christ: yet he will sharply rebuke us, if we remain faithless and perverse amidst abundant opportunities of instruction and conviction. Should we inquire the reason of our ill success, in our conflicts with sin and temptation, and our endeavours to do good; the answer would still be, "Because of your unbelief." Wonderful is the power of holy faith; and nothing is impossible to those who go forth in the Redeemer's name, to obey his commands and promote his cause. But our faith will commonly be strong, and our efforts successful, in proportion as we seek the victory "by fasting and prayer;" and it especially behooves us to make a fair trial of this method, as to those particular conflicts in which we have been most foiled; and those services, respecting which we deplore our want of success.—What a varied scene of outward debasement, and of divine glory, was the life of our Redeemer! Yet all his humiliation made way for his resurrection and final exaltation. Let us then "endure the cross," despise riches and worldly honours, and be contented in poverty, if that be his will concerning us. Let those who are rich learn to be poor in spirit, and not to trust in riches, or to despise the needy, lest they be found to have reproached their Saviour, as well as their Maker. (Notes, 1 Tim. 6:16—19. Jam. 1:9—11. 2:5—7.)—We should always be ready to waive our privileges and exemptions, rather than give offence. Yet we seldom follow the dictates of our own minds, without inquiring the will of God, but we fall into some mistakes, even in things apparently most obvious.—Even the poor believer should be ready to pay tribute and custom, for the credit of the gospel, and trust in the Lord to defray the expense: and "the fishers of men," though needy, may go on cheerfully in their work, trusting in the Lord to supply their wants: for he will, when necessary, bring to their net such as shall be both able and willing to contribute to the support of his cause.—But how glorious are the privileges, and how noble the freedom, of the children of the King of kings! To these privileges we strangers are admitted by faith in Christ; and "if the Son make us free, then shall we be free indeed." (Note, John 8:30—36.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—4. It appears from the other evangelists, that our Lord first inquired of the disciples about what they had disputed by the way: and for some time they remained silent, being afraid to mention the subject. But at length, sensible that he knew their thoughts, they plainly asked him, which of them was to be the greatest in the kingdom, he was about to establish. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Mark 9:33—37. Luke 9:46—50, vv. 46—48.) No doubt they had respect to a supposed secular kingdom, and its dignities and preferments, to the chief of which they all aspired, each resting his claim on a different ground: so that the dispute originated from error, ambition, and emulation; and had no reference to growth in grace, and real eminence in the spiritual kingdom on earth, or to a proportionate degree of glory in heaven.—Had our Lord intended to confer any pre-eminence in authority on Peter, or on any of his successors, he would doubtless at this time have given some intimation of it; but, on the contrary, he treated all such pretensions with the most decided disapprobation. For, having "called a little child unto him, he set him" before them, solemnly assuring them, that "except they were converted, and became as little children, they could not enter his kingdom;" and that he, who should humble himself like the little child, would eventually be found the most excellent and honourable person.—Children, when very young, show little disposition to claim precedence, or to aspire after authority: they willingly associate with their inferiors, are regardless of external distinctions, and devoid of malice and guile: they are docile, simple, submissive to authority, willingly dependent on their parents, and disposed to credit what they say. No doubt, they soon begin to show other propensities, and other ideas are early inculcated on most of them and imbibed by them; but these are the obvious characteristics of childhood, and suffice to render "little children" proper emblems of the humble, unambitious, submissive, and dependent spirit, which is the essence and the excellence of genuine Christianity. Though not innocent, strictly speaking, they are comparatively harmless; as the young, even of the most ferocious animals, are at first innoxious, but soon begin to discover the nature of that stock from which they spring. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Mark 10:13—16, v. 15. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) In general, therefore, little children are apt emblems of those qualities, which are the effects of regeneration: and though all the apostles, except Judas, were at this time regenerate and "converted," in the general sense of the word; yet they all needed a very great change, in respect of their ambition and carnal emulation. It was also proper to show them, that in their present temper they were not only unfit to be the "greatest in the kingdom of heaven," but even unmeet for the meanest station in it; and that the lust of dominion was as contrary to Christianity, as any kind of immorality. (Notes, 20:20—23. 23:11,12. Luke 22:24—27. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.)—'He requires them, to fit them for this kingdom, to become as to these things like little children, who are absolutely free from all contrivances and designs of this nature, never concerned in the least for empire and dominion over others, or for increase in wealth, or great possessions; and know not what a post of honour, or what wealth means: this, saith our Lord, being that which will remove all that obstructs your entrance into my kingdom, and make you the most eminent subjects of it. . . . This frame will render him willing to minister even to the meanest of my members.' Whitby.—As this is the Spirit of the kingdom, they who are most lowly, and most indifferent about consequence and pre-eminence, and most willing to be little, inferior, and neglected, must be the greatest; and not they who have the greatest abilities, most splendid gifts, or most exalted stations in the church.

V. 5, 6. "The little ones," include the meanest of those who come to Christ, and (as far as man can discern) believe in him and belong to him: especially such as, whether ministers or private Christians, being peculiarly humble and "poor in spirit," are the greatest in his sight, though often most slighted by men. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10,11,14. 5:3. Zech. 13:7.) These are the most evident and distinguished representatives of the meek and lowly Saviour; and whoever shall receive them, (that is, embrace in love, entertain, or be kind to them and hearken to instruction from any one of them,) will, in the person of a mean and obscure person, receive Christ himself, and be accepted and recompensed accordingly. (Marg. Ref. l, m. 10:40—42. 25:34—40.) But he who wilfully injures, deceives, or ensnares one of them, is guilty of so great a crime, and, without repentance, will be exposed to so terrible a punishment, that it would be better for him to have a large millstone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the sea, as it was the custom sometimes in executing notorious criminals: and indeed, every one ought to dread stumbling or grieving humble disciples, more than the most terrible death. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 7—9. 26:21—24.)—The word rendered "offend," signifies cause to stumble. It is used both for those who fall and perish, and for those who fall and rise again.—All the disciples were "offended," when Christ was betrayed to his enemies; and Peter especially; but says the Saviour, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." (Notes, 26:30—35. Luke 22:31—34, v. 32.) The conduct, however of those who contemptuously, maliciously, or even heedlessly, did such things as tended to the destruction of their weak brethren, would not be in the least excused, because the special grace of God might prevent the fatal consequences. The men of Lystra, who stoned Paul and left him for dead, were his murderers, in the sight of God, though he was pleased to restore his apostle to life and health.—All attempts therefore to prove or disprove disputed points of doctrine from such passages, are foreign to the purpose of the sacred historians.

Used only here and 14:30.—Depth.] Πελαγει. Used only here and Acts 27:5.

V. 7—9. Our Lord here proceeded to speak more generally concerning "offences:" meaning, not only the injuries and snares, by which men would discourage and entangle his disciples, and bring guilt upon themselves; but all those evils within the church, which prejudice men's minds against his religion, or any of its doctrines, true ministers, and disciples. The scandalous lives, and shameless oppressions, cruelties, and iniquities, of men called Christians, their divisions and bloody contentions, their idolatries and superstitions, are, at this day, the great "offences" and causes of stumbling to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans, in all the four quarters of the globe; they constitute one grand hinderance to the labours of missionaries; and they furnish infidels, of every description, with their most dangerous weapons against the truth. The acrimonious controversies, agitated among those who agree in the principal doctrines of the gospel, and their mutual contempt and revilings, together with the extravagant notions and wicked practices found among them, excite strong prejudices in the minds of great multitudes against evangelical religion; and harden the hearts of heretics, Pharisees, disguised infidels, and careless sinners against the truths of the gospel. In these, and in numberless other ways, it may be said, "Wo unto the world because of offences:" for the devil, the sower of these tares, makes use of them in deceiving the nations of the earth, and in murdering the souls of men. In the present state of human nature "it must needs be, that offences should come;" and God has wise and righteous reasons for permitting them: yet we should consider it as the greatest of personal afflictions, or causes of sorrow and shame, to be accessary to the destruction of souls; and an awful wo is denounced against every one whose delusions or crimes thus stumble men, and set them against the only method of salvation. If this is done wilfully, and is not repented of, the offender's punishment will be most tremendous: and believers ought to dread occasional falls far more than death, and submit to any present loss or self-denial, rather than cause others to fall. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, 2 Sam. 12:14. Luke 17:1—4. Rom. 2:17—24, v. 24. 2 Pet. 2:1—3, v. 2.) In this connexion, therefore, our Lord introduced again a warning and counsel, which have already been considered; (Marg. Ref. s—u, y. Note, 5:29,30.) and which here intimate, that they, who for the sake of temporal interest or 11 For [d]the Son of man is come to save that which was lost.

12 [e]How think ye? [f]If a man have an hundred sheep, and one of them be gone astray, doth he not leave the ninety and nine, and goeth [g]into the mountains, and seeketh that which is gone astray?

indulgence, or from regard to any friend or relative, or to avoid loss or self-denial, wilfully cause others to stumble; have reason to suspect themselves of hypocrisy, and to fear lest they should perish through their own unmortified lusts, and so fall into perdition themselves, as well as prove scandals to their profession.—We ought not to forget, that there was a Judas in the company to which this warning was addressed.—'The necessity here mentioned is therefore only conditional, on supposition of the wickedness of men not hindered, the subtlety and malignity of Satan, and the self-denial required of all who would embrace the gospel; whence nothing could be expected, but that many should be scandalized at, and be unwilling to embrace the gospel upon these terms, and many who had once embraced it should fly off from it.' Whitby. To maintain any other kind of necessity, is not Christian predestination, but heathen fatalism.—We cannot for a moment suppose, that any will enter halt or maimed into heaven: but even if that could be, it would be infinitely preferable to being "cast into everlasting fire." (Marg. Ref. x, z. Notes, 25:41—46, vv. 41,46. Mark 9:43—50. Rev. 20:11—15, v. 15.)

V. 10, 11. The same heresies, divisions, and scandals, which cause numbers to stumble to their ruin, frequently mislead and ensnare unestablished believers also; and thus tend as much to their destruction as any thing can do. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Rom. 14:13—18, vv. 13,15,19—23, vv. 19—21. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.) Such as are strong, or think themselves so, are apt to undervalue and despise weak, wavering, and unconfirmed disciples, when they see them mistaken or perplexed in their judgments; and liable to be discouraged or drawn aside, by example, authority, persuasion, or plausible reasonings: yet these things may often be the effect of deep humility, combined with weak natural abilities and insufficient instruction. Our Lord therefore cautioned his disciples not to aspire after being the greatest, and not to despise the least, of those who professed themselves his disciples. The persons whom he addressed, were ministers, and the admonition is therefore especially directed to all their successors in that sacred function; who are, alas! very apt to pay far more regard to the eminent, the wise, and the strong, (not to say the wealthy,) than to the poor, the ignorant, and the weak of the flock. (Notes, Rom. 14:1—6. 15:1—3. Gal. 6:1—5.) In enforcing this exhortation, our Lord assigned some peculiar reasons for it: and first, he declared that "their angels do always behold he face of his Father which is in heaven." The holy angels always behold the face and enjoy the favour of the eternal God, and approach him as his most exalted and honourable worshippers. Yet "they ... are all sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation;" and weak and trembling believers seem to be their special charge. They do not think their attention to the new convert, or to the discouraged, poor, or despised Christian, any degradation from their dignity, or any interruption of their felicity: nay, it seems as if they enjoyed special tokens of the divine approbation when thus employed. And should their brethren on earth despise those whom angels delight to attend on! (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, Heb. 1:13,14.)—Again, "the Son of Man," whom they knew to be the Son of God also, came into the world "to save that which was lost:" he did not despise them, even when "dead in sin," and when strangers or enemies. Did he then stoop so low to save them, and should his disciples and ministers despise those weak brethren, whom he was bringing home to himself?—'For Christ that came to reduce [bring back] those that are gone astray from the ways of God, must ... require the same of you: to be most diligent and industrious to reduce the meanest person upon earth, that is in a course of any danger of ruin to the soul.' Hammond. (*Marg. That which was lost, (11) Το απολωλος· (The preter tense.) Luke 15:6,24,32. 19:10.

V. 12, 13. In illustrating this subject, our Lord added a parable, with an appeal to the understandings and hearts of his hearers. If a man had a hundred sheep in his pasture and one of them should go astray, would not this wandering sheep more occupy his attention, than all the rest? Would he not go to the mountains to seek it, until he found it? And would he not, in that case, express more joy on account of it, than for all those which had never gone astray?—This shows the exposed, helpless condition of perishing sinners, who, having wandered from God, are liable to be destroyed by Satan, and to fall into hell: even as sheep, when they have wandered from the fold or pasture, are exposed to devouring beasts, or to fall into a pit and perish.—It moreover shows, that the good Shepherd knows his flock, even before they are brought into his fold; that he seeks them before they seek him; and that he rejoices in saving them from all enemies and dangers. And surely his ministers, and all his disciples, ought to concur in this design; to rejoice at the appearance of a sinner's conversion; to encourage and help the weak; and not to despise, grieve, or stumble them. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. 23:1—3, v. 3. 119:176. Is. 53:4—6. Ez. 34:2—6, 11—16. Luke 15:3—7. P. O. 1—10.—Notes, John 10:14—18. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 25.)

V. 14. From this striking comparison our Lord shows the care which the Father takes of the weakest of his true people. The disciples of Christ ought therefore to copy the example of angels, of the Son of God, and of the Father himself, respecting them; and not that of proud Pharisees. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Luke 15:1,2,8—10,22—32. John 6:36—40. 10:26—31.)—'God is very unwilling that any, the meanest person upon earth, should be lost, that might, by any care or methods of ours, be recovered to piety.' Hammond. 'The weaker a man is, the greater care we ought to have of his salvation, as God teacheth us by his own example.' Beza (Note, 1 Tim. 2:3,4.)

V. 15—17. Contentions among Christians tend exceedingly to set the world against the gospel: (Note, Luke 17:3,4.) and as they must arise, in this present state, among persons who are sanctified only in part, and who are liable both to give cause for anger, and to be "angry without cause" themselves; our Lord next prescribed some rules for stopping the progress, and preventing the consequences of them, which could seldom fail of being effectual, if honestly and exactly followed. In case a man should be injured by a brother, a professed Christian; he ought not to go and complain of it to others, (as is commonly done, perhaps upon rumour;) thus inflaming his own resentment, and wounding his neighbour's reputation: but he ought to go privately; and in a gentle, yet plain and convincing manner, to state the matter, and show him the injustice and unreasonableness of his conduct. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Lev. 19:17. Prov. 25:8—10.) It this produces a proper effect, (as it generally will with a true Christian,) and he sees and acknowledges his fault; then the offending brother is won over, gained and recovered from the tempter; and, instead of an open breach, a cordial reconciliation takes place, and love is continued, nay increased. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, Jam. 5:19,20.) But if this private application fail of success, and the offender persist in his injury, and refuse reasonable terms of agreement; the offended party is next ordered to take with him one or two other Christian friends, who may hear and bear witness to the facts which are alleged, and the terms of accommodation proposed; that they may be reported to the church on more unexceptionable testimony. And if these witnesses determine the person to be faulty, and approve of the concessions required; and he refuse to hearken to them, and persist in his injury: it will then be necessary to declare the matter more openly, not to the world, but "to the church;" (i. e. to the ministers and disciples of Christ;) that the injurious party may be solemnly censured and reproved by them. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes.

And if he still refuse to submit, he ought thenceforth to be considered "as a heathen man, and a publican;" and should be shunned by all pious Christians, that he may be ashamed; and excluded from their communion, till he give tokens of repentance.—It would be absurd to restrict these rules to any particular form of church government and discipline; yet they certainly suppose the existence of government and discipline among the disciples of Christ, and the exclusion of disorderly persons, from those societies to which they immediately belong: and they are capable of being reduced to practice, under different forms of church government: though they are, alas! in great measure, neglected by all. V. 18. In confirmation of this procedure, our Lord added a solemn assurance, that such decisions would be ratified in heaven; whether they expelled the unruly person from communion, or received the penitent by reversing the sentence. This supposes, that the persons concerned decided according to truth and equity, for a groundless sentence of excommunication, or absolution, cannot possibly make any alteration in a man's state or character: all such decisions being merely declaratory. This has been entirely overlooked, in all those scandalous perversions of church censures, which are the real cause of that relaxation, or rather destitution of discipline, which now so generally prevails. (Marg. Ref. See on Note, 16:19.)—Our Lord spoke to the apostles, and to all of them. The absolute authority given them was inseparably connected with their immediate inspiration: and all their successors, pretended or real, from the conclave at Rome to an independent church meeting, are concerned in the promise; just so far as their decisions, whether they bind or loose, accord to the doctrines, precepts, and rules, transmitted to us from the apostles: and no further.—'Nor shall you only in these cases have power, as Christians, to loose your repenting, and bind your obstinately offending brother: but, as you are my apostles, to whom I have promised my Spirit, "to teach you all things, and lead you into all truth;" ... whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth, or shall declare to be forbidden on pain of my displeasure, shall render them indeed obnoxious to my wrath: and whatsoever things ye shall loose on earth, (though once required by divine authority, of those who owned the law of Moses,) shall be loosed in heaven; and men shall be allowed to do them, without incurring my displeasure. And in this sense, this promise is the foundation of our obligation to believe and obey all the commands and doctrines of the apostles, and of the cessation of the ritual precepts of the law of Moses.' Whitby.—Authority, to the extent of the words used by our Lord, many have claimed, but God never gave it to any, except his inspired apostles: and in this view, the promise is our Lord's full attestation to all the writings, which by them, and under their inspection, were given to the church and to posterity, as the infallible "oracles of God."

V. 19, 20. It is here supposed, that all such transactions as those above mentioned, would be conducted with prayer for direction, and for the humiliation of the offender: and in this case not only might an answer be expected, when many should concur: but even when two persons should agree to present their joint request on earth, the eternal Father, whose throne is in heaven, would surely regard and answer it. Some interpret this, of those miraculous interpositions, by which the censures of the church were sometimes followed and confirmed in the primitive times; or restrict it to the apostles, in the execution of their important office: and, as they were immediately addressed, this might be especially intended: (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:18—21, v. 21. 5:1—5, v. 5. 2 Cor. 13:1—4,7—10. 1 Tim. 1:18—20.) yet it seems to be also a general promise encouraging social prayer, especially in arduous cases. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) When such prayers are presented in faith, and the petition of them is conducive to our good, and to the glory of God, we are every where warranted to expect a favourable answer: and limitations must have been implied, even in the days when miracles were wrought.—To this our Lord added, that when two or three were assembled in his name; that is, in dependence on his promise, in obedience to his command, out of love to him, and regard to his glory, for prayer, or other acts of worship, to hear his word, or to regulate those things which pertain to the peace and purity of his church; "there," says He, "I AM in the midst of you:" He says not I will be, but I am, referring to his divine presence, at all times and in all places; and to his special presence by the influences of his Spirit, to communicate blessings to his people, whenever or wherever they wait upon him for them.—Two or three of his true disciples may be thus met together, in ten thousand different places all over the earth, at the same time: this must therefore be allowed to be a direct assertion of his omnipresent Deity; and cannot, on any other supposition, be rendered consistent with propriety. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, 28:19,20, v. 20. Ex. 3:14. 20:21—25, v. 24. John 8:54—59, v. 58. Rev. 3:1—3, v. 1.)

V. 21, 22. As our Lord had intimated that his disciples must bestow much pains to preserve or restore peace with their offending brethren, Peter wanted to be informed how often they were required to renew their forgiveness of injuries, to such as repeated the offence. And, perhaps with reference to the traditions of the elders, he asked whether they were to proceed as far as seven times. To this our Lord answered, that they ought to forgive, not only to the seventh time, but "to seventy times seven:" meaning an indefinite number; even as often as men renew their offences, or as God renews his pardons to believers. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 17:3,4.)—'The determination of the Rabbins in this case, runs thus: that three offences are to be remitted, but not the fourth: and this they gather from those words, "For three transgressions, and for four, I will not turn away my wrath." (Am. 1:3.) St. Peter puts the three and the four together, as perhaps others of their doctors did; and asks, whether he must forgive "till seven times."' Whitby.

V. 23—27. To illustrate the subject Jesus spoke a parable. "The kingdom of heaven," or the Lord's method of dealing with men, in that kingdom which was about to be set up under the Messiah, (Note, 3:2.) might be compared to that of a king, who required his servants to render their accounts of the sums which they had received, and the way in which they had employed them. This represents God himself, as calling men to account for the use which they have made of their abilities and advantages; especially, as by his conduct in this respect, the true Christian is distinguished from the hypocrite. (Notes, 25:14—30. Luke 16:1—12.)—The king in this inquiry soon met with one, who, having been high in office and very unfaithful, owed him ten thousand talents, which by the lowest computation amounts to nearly two millions ster-hundred *pence; and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, Pay me that thou owest.

29 And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, [m]Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all.

30 And he would not: [n]but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt.

31 So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, [o]they were very sorry, [p]and came and told unto their lord all that was done.

32 Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, [q]O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me:

33 Shouldest not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, [r]even as I had pity on thee?

34 And his lord was wroth, [s]and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him.

35 So likewise shall my heavenly Father [t]do also unto you, if ye [u]from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.

ling. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. Tables.) This represents our immense obligations to God, and our exceedingly great guilt as transgressors of his law, which is also increased by the neglect or abuse of his gospel: all indeed are deeply indebted, but some far more than others. (Note, Luke 7:40—43.)—As the servant was wholly unable to pay this very great debt, his lord commanded that he, and his wife, and children, should be sold for slaves, and his substance confiscated, according to the custom of those countries, in order that payment might be made. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Ex. 21:2. 2 Kings 4:1. Neh. 5:1—5. Is. 50:1—3, v. 1. Dan. 6:24.) This represents the strictness of the law and justice of God, and the dreadful punishment to which sinners are righteously exposed; from which they cannot deliver themselves, and in which their connexions are often involved.—The servant, terrified by this sentence, in the most submissive posture, craved time and patience, and promised that he would at length discharge the whole debt: this may show the terrors and convictions to which men are subject from a view of the severity of God's justice, and that general hope of mercy by which they seek relief; but the engagement, "I will pay thee all," seems an intended intimation of an unhumbled and self-confident spirit. (Notes, 28—30, v. 29. Luke 7:40—43, v. 42. Rom. 10:1—4.)—The lord, however, of that servant is induced, by compassion, to set him at liberty and to remit the debt; knowing well that he would never be able to pay it: this represents the Lord's readiness to forgive all true penitents; and the false conclusions which many thence draw concerning their sins being pardoned, though they be not truly penitent. V. 28—30. This person, who had experienced such extraordinary lenity, went out, and met with a fellow-servant, who owed him a trifling debt of a hundred denarii, or a little more than three pounds sterling: and, laying hold of him by the throat, (in a fierce and insolent manner, as if he meant to strangle him,) insisted upon immediate payment: and even when the other used the very same words to him which he had used to his lord, he would not wait, but cast him into prison till he should pay the debt: though his debtor might very well in a short time have paid this small debt which he owed; but he himself could never have discharged the immense sum due to his prince. This shows the selfishness, severity, and unrelenting spirit of many who profess religion; and their pertinacious resentments, the result of pride, hardness of heart, and malevolence: for even their views of the gospel, and their forced confessions, serve to exasperate them, instead of softening and meliorating their tempers. Such men deal with their neighbours in so severe a manner, that if God mete to them by the same measure, as no doubt he will, "judgment without mercy" must be their portion. (Notes, 7:1,2. Jam. 2:8—13, v. 13.)—'This seemeth to bear hard on those unmerciful and unchristian creditors, who cast poor men, who they know have nothing to pay, into prison for their debt; ... so rendering their brother's state more miserable, and their debt from him as desperate as ever. For sure, he that bid us "lend, hoping for nothing again," will not allow us to imprison, where nothing can be hoped for: and it is to be feared that men so unmerciful may find but little mercy at that day. For if it be a crime that will then be objected to our condemnation, that we did not visit Christians when in prison, what will it be to cast them into prison?' Whitby. (Marg. Ref.)—Ten thousand talents were six hundred thousand times as much as the hundred denarii, calculating by Roman talents; (Marg.) by the Jewish talent, they were more than double that sum. V. 31—35. When the fellow-servants saw this transaction, "they were grieved" to see a man, who had so merciful a master, thus cruel to one who was in his power: and they came to inform their lord of all these things. This shows, that real Christians are grieved and shocked at the misconduct of professed believers, more than at the wickedness of those who do not make any pretensions to religion, and that they complain to God of the dishonour thus done to his gospel.—The lord then called the servant, and, having reproached him for acting in so direct and marked an opposition to his merciful example; and shown the wickedness of his character, and the unreasonableness of his conduct, he, with deep indignation, delivered him over to the executioners of justice, to be confined and punished by them till he had paid the whole debt; and as he was not able to pay it, he could never obtain deliverance. (Marg. Ref. o—s. Notes, 7:21—23. 25:24—30.)—'God's pardons here in this life are not to us absolute, ... but, according to the petition in our Lord's prayer, answerable to our dealings with others, and so conditional, and are no longer likely to be continued to us, than we perform that condition.' Hammond. Where then is the "blessedness of him, whose iniquities are forgiven?" (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8,14—17.) "He that heareth my words and believeth in him that sent me," saith our Lord, "hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." (Notes, John 5:24—27, v. 24. 6:36—40. 10:26—31. Rom. 8:1,2,28—39.)—Circumstances in parables do not always admit of minute application. In the parable of the prodigal son, the elder brother, who was evidently the representative of the Pharisees, is spoken of as heir of all his father's property. (Note, Luke 15:25—32.) Our Lord frequently addressed men, according to what they thought of themselves, and not according to their real character. The servant, in this parable, bears no one mark of an humble penitent: and none but humble penitents are true believers, or really pardoned; though many others think themselves so. The general tenor of Scripture excludes the supposition, that God actually forgives men, and then afterwards imputes guilt to them to their final condemnation. (Notes, Ps. 103:11—13. Jer. 31:33,34. Mic. 7:18—20. Heb. 8:7—13, v. 12.) But men will at last be dealt with, not according to their confidence; but according as their conduct, especially towards their offending brethren, has evidenced the reality of their faith and love, or the contrary. This is our Lord's own inference from it: whatever men's profession may be, God will deliver them as "wicked servants" to the tormentors, to be punished according to their sins with exact justice; if they "do not from their hearts," which he especially regards, "forgive their brethren their trespasses." No doubt, if true believers are betrayed into any degree of this unchristian spirit, they will experience frowns, rebukes, and chastenings: but to suppose that a real Christian can be habitually of this unmerciful and malignant temper, and act according to it, (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 6:12,14,15. Luke 6:37,38. 17:3,4. Eph. 5:30—32. Col. 3:12—15. Jam. 2:8—13, vv. 12,13.) directly militates against the design of the parable, and of the whole Scripture; and is calculated to encourage selfish, revengeful, and hard-hearted professors of evangelical doctrine, who are the scandal of the gospel, and as unlike Christ as the grossest libertine or drunkard in the world.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. Pride and ambition are so deeply rooted in our fallen nature; that they remain, and often break forth, even in those who are "born of God." Hence so many contentions in the church: not only among those nominal Christians, whose religion is merely an occasion of aspiring to distinction and influence; but even among real disciples, who are tempted to seek pre-eminence above their brethren, after they have given up their prospects of worldly honour and greatness. (Notes, Prov. 13:10. 2 Cor. 12:7—10, v. 7. Phil. 2:1—4, v. 3.) Such ambitious plans and desires, however, are peculiarly contrary to the spirit of the gospel, and to the character of Christ; and are productive of envy, discord, and other fatal consequences. In this, as well as in other respects, we need to be daily more and more "renewed in the spirit of our mind," that we may "become as little children, simple," humble, and willing to be "the least of all and the servants of all." If we have not some measure of this disposition, and yet think ourselves the subjects of Christ, we are awfully deceived: and he, who has made the greatest proficiency in self-abasement, is in fact the greatest in the kingdom of grace, and will shine the brightest in the kingdom of glory. We ought, therefore, daily to reflect and meditate on this subject, and to examine our own spirits respecting it, that we may be more and more cast into the mould of the gospel, and that we may learn to behave properly towards our fellow-Christians;

CHAPTER XIX.

Jesus journeys towards Judea, and heals the sick, 1,2; answers the Pharisees concerning divorces, and his disciples on the expediency of marriage, 1—12; receives little children, 13—15; discourses with a rich young man, concerning eternal life, and detects his love of wealth more than of God, 16—22; shows the difficulty of a rich man's salvation, 23—26; and makes gracious promises to those, who renounce worldly objects for his sake, 27—30.

AND it came to pass, [a]that when Jesus had finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee, and came into the coasts of Judea beyond Jordan:

2 And [b]great multitudes followed him; and he healed them there.

3 ¶ The Pharisees also came unto him, [c]tempting him, and saying unto him, [d]Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?

4 And he answered and said unto them, [e]Have ye not read [f]that he, which made them at the beginning, made them male and female,

5 And [g]said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall [h]cleave to his wife; [i]and they twain shall be one flesh?

6 Wherefore they are no more twain, but one flesh. What therefore [k]God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

esteeming and honouring those whom the Lord honours, and being afraid of injuring or grieving, or in any way stumbling, any of his little ones, however feeble, poor, or obscure.

V. 7—14. What miseries come upon the world, through the scandals which prevail in the church! This warning should indeed render men very careful, not to admit prejudices against Christianity, or any peculiar doctrines, from the misconduct of those who profess them; but to examine what Christianity is, in its nature and tendency, as it stands in the Scripture. Yet, alas! few will adopt this method. While, therefore, we mourn over the evils which we cannot remedy, we should be careful not to add to them; and should fear death far less than dishonouring the gospel, and causing souls to stumble and perish by our misconduct. We ought constantly to associate the idea of the Redeemer's glory, with that of our own salvation; and to mortify every inclination, and renounce every interest, which may throw a stumbling-block in the way of others, even as if it endangered the loss of our own souls. This disposition is a proper evidence that we are true believers: but how dreadful will be the disappointment of selfish or self-indulgent persons, who, taking it for granted that they are safe, and not caring about the souls of their neighbours, prove the occasion of their ruin; and will at last sink themselves into the unquenchable and everlasting fire of hell, under the guilt of those sins, and the power of those darling sinful inclinations, which they refused here to relinquish and mortify? We should then keep at a great distance from this and every extreme, and labour to remove those offences which prejudice men against the gospel: remembering, that those persons are peculiarly entitled to our prayers, and to every degree of countenance which we can give them, who attempt, by any proper means, to terminate the cruel oppressions which are the reproach of the Christian name; or to reform corruptions, and heal divisions, within the church.—Numbers, who have been in some degree awakened to a concern about their souls, stumble and perish by the misconduct of professed disciples; and weak Christians are greatly harassed and perplexed by them. We ought, therefore, seriously to consider, what effects our conduct may have upon persons of these descriptions: and by no means to despise the scruples and mistakes of our weak brethren, or endanger their comfort and progress from selfish motives. Ministers, especially, are called upon to watch over the weak, feeble, and discouraged, and the young unestablished convert, to "comfort the feeble minded," and to be gentle, and compassionate, and long-suffering towards them. And shall any of us refuse attention to those, unto whom the blessed angels delight to minister; whom the Son of God came to seek and save; and concerning whom "it is the Father's good pleasure, that not one of them should perish?" This would be the more inexcusable in us, seeing we all have been "as lost sheep," and have been ransomed by the blood, and brought back by the tender care, of our good Shepherd; who delights more in saving lost sinners, than even in the worship of those holy angels, who never went astray; and who receives, as it were, a new accession of joy and glory, by every one that is brought back to his fold. Let us then remember from what a dreadful state we have been saved, and copy the pattern of our gracious Benefactor; and let us study to be gentle, harmless, and useful, as behooves "the sheep of his pasture."

V. 15—22. How careful should all Christians be, to preserve the peace, as well as the purity, of the church! Alas! many deem themselves injured, when in reality they have no cause to complain: and others have recourse to slander and litigation, and almost every other expedient, instead of trying the method which Christ has expressly enjoined to all his disciples; and few, in any place, have uniformly followed these directions of our common Lord. Various corrupt maxims, customs, and reserves, prevent even conscientious men from speaking privately to their offending brethren, and from referring their disputes to the arbitration of pious Christians: hence jealousies, resentments, contentions, and even frivolous lawsuits, among professors of the gospel; and hence mutual criminations, and appeals in print to the world against each other, to the scandal of religion, and the insulting triumphs of its enemies! Surely we ought not to harbour so injurious an opinion of a professed Christian, as to think, that he would not endure to be mildly expostulated with, when he had evidently done wrong! Surely we should prefer gaining, recovering, and conciliating our offending brother, to obtaining a victory over him, or exposing his character! And certainly he who has done injustice, and will not be induced to make moderate concessions and amends, by private expostulations, or by the united judgment of Christians and ministers; has no right to be treated as a believer, till he "repent and do works meet for repentance." Harsher means should never be adopted, till milder have been tried without success. No man should think himself a competent judge in his own cause: nor should any Christian seek legal redress, till it is evident, that no other means can procure that justice, which it is requisite should be done him. Indeed the abuse of discipline, through the pride and corrupt passions of men, has so prejudiced the minds of numbers against it, that it is grievously fallen into disuse: yet, in whatever way the faithful ministers of Christ, and consistent believers, concur to show their decided disapprobation of an offender's conduct, on scriptural grounds, by withdrawing from his society, or objecting to communion with him in holy ordinances, it ought to be deemed a very solemn matter: for whatsoever is thus bound or loosed on earth, shall be ratified in heaven, however the offender may despise the protest.—In all our undertakings we should seek direction by prayer; and we cannot too highly value the promises of God to this effect: all the general concerns of families and churches, should be conducted with social as well as secret prayer: nor should we ever censure or rebuke any man, without at the same time praying for his humiliation and salvation.—Whenever we meet in the name of Christ, in our families, or in public ordinances, at any time, or in any place, we should realize his presence in the midst of us; that we may both be impressed with awe of his holy, heart-searching eye upon us, and encouraged to expect abundant blessings from him.

V. 23—35. While we sinners live so entirely on mercy and forgiveness, how backward are we to forgive the repeated offences of our brethren! Yet let us not think, that any provocation can authorize us to harbour resentment, or seek revenge. This we can never suppose, if we consider duly, how many and aggravated our former and later transgressions have been, against our Creator and daily Benefactor; and how ready he is to forgive us, when we repent and seek his face. If he enter into judgment with us, our debt will be found immensely large; all the terrible curses of the law will be adjudged to be our righteous desert; and it will be in vain for us to say, "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." This the humbled sinner will perceive, and he will rely only on free abounding mercy, through the ransom of the death of Christ: in this way, his sins will be "blotted out," and "buried in the depths of the sea;" and his gentle, forgiving, and compassionate spirit and conduct towards those who have injured him, or are dependent on him, will prove him a partaker of the Spirit and mind of Christ. But the unhumbled professor of the gospel will often betray himself, by a harsh, unforgiving, and unrelenting behaviour to his debtors, his servants, the poor, and especially to those who have offended him. Such men scandalize the cause, and grieve true believers: but they deceive and destroy themselves; and their offended Lord will shortly deliver them, as "wicked servants," to the executioners of his vengeance, and the everlasting punishment prepared for the workers of iniquity. (Note, 25:41—46.) Let us then examine ourselves, whether "from our hearts we forgive every one his brother his trespasses." Let us frequently ask ourselves, whether our conduct towards poor debtors, supplicants, or such as have affronted us, resembles the merciful conduct of our Lord towards us: and let us seek more and more for the renewing grace of God, to teach us to forgive others, even as we hope for forgiveness from him.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIX. V. 1, 2. This seems to have been our Lord's final departure from Galilee, previous to his crucifixion: but he took a large compass in his journey, and passed through the districts which lay east of Jordan. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 13:22—30, v. 22.)

V. 3—6. 'The school of Hillel taught, that a man might put away his wife for any cause, because this divorce was permitted, "if she found not grace in his eyes." (Deut. 24:1.) —The son of Sirach saith, 'If she go not as thou wouldst have her, cut her off from thy flesh, give her a bill of divorce, and let her go.' (Ecclesias. 25:26.) And Josephus saith, 7 They say unto him, [l]Why did Moses then command to give a writing of divorcement, [m]and to put her away?

8 He saith unto them, Moses, [n]because of the hardness of your hearts, [o]suffered you to put away your wives: [p]but from the beginning it was not so.

9 And I say unto you, [q]Whosoever shall put away his wife, [r]except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away, [s]doth commit adultery.

'The law runs thus, He that will be disjoined from his wife, for any cause whatsoever, as many such causes there are, let him give her a bill of divorce.' And he confesseth that he himself put away his wife, after she had borne him three children, because he was not pleased with her behaviour. But the school of Shammah determined on the contrary, that the wife was only to be put away for adultery; because it is said, "Because he hath found some uncleanness in her."' Whitby. (Notes, 5:31, 32. Ex. 20:14. Mark 10:2—12. Luke 16:16—18.)—These Pharisees had probably heard, that Jesus opposed their decisions concerning divorces; and they were desirous of drawing something from him, which they could represent as contrary to the law of Moses. With this insidious design, they questioned him, "whether it were lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause." That is, on account of any thing in her temper, or person, or for any infirmity, which rendered her disagreeable. (Note, Deut. 24:1—4.) To this he replied, by referring to the history of the creation, and the original institution of marriage; intimating, that this was the standard by which all transactions in this important concern ought to be regulated, as every deviation was an abuse consequent on man's depravity. The Creator first formed Adam, and from his side took the rib of which the woman was made: from this one man and one woman, the whole human species had descended. When the Lord brought the woman, Adam acknowledged her as a part of himself; and it was added, (either by Adam as immediately inspired, or by Moses,) that "for this cause," in all future ages, "a man should leave father and mother," foregoing many of the comforts, and relinquishing many of the duties, of these endeared relations, and "cleave to his wife," as a part of himself. Thus these two would constitute, as it were, one body, never more to be separated, except by God himself, who in this appointment of marriage had joined them together; but to have ever after the same interests, and to share each other's comforts or sorrows, even as the members of the same body do.—When marriage was instituted, sin and death had not entered: the sinful cause of separation afterwards mentioned, and the natural dissolution of the union, were therefore not referred to: but they have since been specified, and resemble the cutting off of a mortified limb, and the separation of the parts of the body by death. In all other respects, the union is to be considered as indissoluble. It is observable, that Christ inserts the word "twain," which is not in the original institution, but is added by the LXX, purposely, as it seems, to obviate all misconstruction of his meaning. (Marg. Ref. c—g. Notes, Gen. 2:21—25.)—The apostle warning the Corinthians against fornication, says "He that is joined (ὁ κολλωμενος) to an harlot, is one flesh." Hence some have endeavoured to prove, that nothing more is essential to marriage than carnal knowledge; and that every woman is in fact the wife of him who first knows her; from which the most detestable inferences have been deduced. But if this were so, such a crime as simple fornication could not exist, nor such a character as a harlot: for every female must either be a virgin, a wife, an adulteress, or a widow.—The apostle, however, could not mean this: for the woman of whom he spake is supposed to have been previously a harlot, not a virgin: (Note, 1 Cor. 6:12—17, vv. 15—17.) and surely none will say, that when a man becomes one "flesh with a harlot," they are "joined together by God, and man must not put them asunder!"—The Lord brought Eve to Adam, and gave her to him, and thus joined them together in marriage, previous to their connubial intercourse: and some established and attested recognition, as well as the consent of parties, is absolutely needful to honourable marriage, and to distinguish those who live in that state, from the "adulterers and fornicators whom God will judge."—The pernicious effects, which the author has witnessed, of the licentious sentiments above stated, and the sanction which they have received from the names of those who have supported them, and from their plausible reasonings, (which seem very convincing to a sensual mind, when under powerful temptation,) render these hints peculiarly needful.—It may also be added, that they, who from erroneous religious motives, either separate themselves from their wives or husbands, or counsel others to do so, whatever specious arguments they may use, most evidently act in direct violation of Christ's command.

V. 7—9. We find from St. Mark, that our Lord asked the Pharisees, what Moses had commanded them; (Mark 10:4.) and to this they answered, that he had "commanded to give a bill, &c." (Mark 10:4,5.)—'Because politic laws are constrained to bear with some things, it followeth not that God alloweth them.' Beza. (Notes, Ex. 21:2. Deut. 24:1—4.)—Our Lord then showed them, that this was not a command, but a permission: they were "suffered," without punishment by the magistrate, to put away their wives; because they were so hard-hearted, that they would otherwise have used them ill, or even murdered them; so that this permission was a stigma on the national character, a testimony against the depravity of human nature, a judicial regulation, and a departure from the original institution of marriage, and the meaning of the moral law. The general scope of this reasoning is equally applicable to polygamy. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Note 3—6.—A question has been raised, and copiously disputed, whether those who, according to this permission, put away their wives, or married others, committed sin against God. But it is a question, in which we are little concerned.—In a state of sinless perfection, such things would not have been even desired. Some, no doubt, were very criminal in availing themselves of the permission, and were adulterers in the sight of God. Others might have stronger reasons and better motives for their conduct: and whatever was sinful in those true believers, who allowed themselves in the practices thus tolerated or connived at, was no doubt forgiven by the special mercy of God, on their general repentance.—Our Lord however added, that thenceforth whosoever should put away his wife, except for unchastity, (which violates the marriage covenant, and destroys as it were the very nature of it,) and should marry another woman, would be adjudged an adulterer; as that man also would, who should marry the divorced woman. Whatever injustice there might be in the divorce, it could not be "adultery against" the divorced woman, if the man and woman were not put entirely upon a level in this respect: so that, under the Christian dispensation, it is as much adultery for the husband to take another woman, as for the wife to take another man. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Mal. 2:13—16. Mark 10:2—12, vv. 11, 12. Luke 16:16—18, v. 18. 1 Cor. 7:1—5.)—Some argue, that as adultery was punishable by death, according to the law of Moses, and the betrothed virgin was considered as the wife of him to whom she was contracted, and included in this law; the word rendered "fornication" should be here understood in its usual sense, exclusively: so that the reason why the woman who had been guilty of fornication might, nay must, be divorced, was this: 'She was in fact another man's wife, and to retain her would be to live in adultery.'—This, however, increases the difficulty; for the woman who was detected at her marriage of unchastity before her espousals, was likewise condemned to die: so that, supposing these three laws rigorously executed, no woman detected, after marriage, of previous fornication could escape death; and according to this opinion, no man might marry her, who pleaded guilty of that crime, because she was already another man's wife. (Notes, Lev. 20:10—19, v. 10. Deut. 22:13—27.)—For in that case none could be spared, but she who confessed her guilt, and no man on this supposition might marry her: and surely it is very absurd to suppose, that a word constantly used in an ill sense through the whole Scripture, should here be considered as synonymous with marriage: for unless the woman who had committed fornication was by so doing married to her paramour, the whole argument falls to the ground.—Did not many lay hold of such unguarded concessions, in reputable writers, to support or palliate a most licentious system, which is secretly doing immense mischief, learned men might possess their peculiar notions undisturbed, at least by the author.—In fact, these laws were seldom rigorously executed under the Old Testament: being judicial regulations, they were not intended for the new dispensation, as of divine obligation; and concerning this our Lord was authoritatively laying down injunctions.—The word rendered "fornication" is in many places used as a general term; so that, undoubtedly, the common interpretation is the true one.—'Note also hence, that according to either interpretation, where it is lawful to put away the wife, it is so to marry again.' Whitby.

their countrymen: they supposed, that the regulations made by their Lord, would in many cases render marriage a source of perpetual uneasiness; and they concluded, that it would be most prudent and conducive to happiness, to continue unmarried. To this Jesus replied, that all men were not capable of complying with such a restriction; as continence in this absolute sense was a special gift of God to some, and not to others: for seeing it was his plan, that the human species should be continued, and that men should generally marry for that purpose; he had so constituted them, that many could not live, conscientiously and comfortably, in a single state. Indeed some were born with such a temperament of body, that they were all their lives devoid of those inclinations, to which others are subject: some were mutilated in infancy, through the avarice or policy of men: and others were successful in their endeavours to subdue their natural inclinations, that they might more entirely dedicate their time and talents to the service of God, and have less encumbrance in so doing. And if any man found himself disposed to that kind of life, and capable of it; it might "be good for him not to marry," as he might be more useful in promoting the kingdom of heaven among men. Thus our Lord intimated to the apostles, that, whatever they chose for themselves, they must impose no restrictions on others in this matter. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Cor. 7:1—9,25—28. P. O. 1—9,25—28,32—40.)—That which all men may obtain by prayer, temperance, and fasting, . . . cannot be called a special gift, or a gift proper to some.' Whithy.

V. 13—15. Several instances occur of those, who applied to Christ in behalf of their afflicted relations and friends: but these persons brought their "little children," or infants, to him, in order that he might lay his hands on them, and pray for them, or bless them. As it was evident that they were in health, and too young to receive instruction; the disciples thought that the parents gave their Lord needless trouble, or that it would be beneath him to notice infants: and they therefore "rebuked those who brought them." (Mark 10:13.) Yet the conduct of the parents was evidently an expression of high regard to Jesus, and an earnest desire of spiritual blessings on their children: he therefore was "much displeased" with the disciples, for discouraging the application; and directed them to "suffer the little children to come to him" without molestation; "for, of such," added he, "is the kingdom of heaven."—He might in part be displeased with the disciples, for so soon forgetting that instructive discourse which has been considered: (Notes, 18:1—6.) and doubtless he meant to encourage parents to seek a blessing from him on their children, from their earliest infancy; and to teach the children to seek to him, as soon as they can understand his words. But the expression "of such is the kingdom of heaven," seems to mean, that little children are admissible into the visible church, under the New Testament dispensation, as they had been under that of Moses. Christ did not indeed order these infants to be baptized; for Christian baptism was not then explicitly instituted as the initiatory ordinance, and circumcision was still in force. (Note, 28:19,20.) Yet the passage seems to give considerable sanction to that method of bringing children to Christ, that they may be admitted among the subjects of his visible kingdom: and we must think those disciples at present mistaken, who object to it, sometimes with arguments, which would have equally held good against infant circumcision, or against "bringing infants to Christ that he might touch them." Indeed, the expression may also intimate that the kingdom of heavenly glory is greatly constituted of such as die in their infancy. Infants are as capable of regeneration as grown persons; and there is ground to conclude, that all those who have not lived to commit actual transgressions, though they share in the effects of the first Adam's offence, will also share in the blessings of the second Adam's gracious covenant; without their personal faith and obedience, but not without the regenerating influence of the Spirit of Christ.—What a topic of expostulation would this transaction give the ministers of Christ, if these parents afterwards brought up their children in an unchristian manner, or set them a bad example! or with the children, if they renounced that Saviour, who had so condescendingly taken them in his arms and blessed them! In what a variety of ways might instructions and admonitions, both to the parents and the children, have been grounded upon it; and what a sweet subject of converse would it afford to the parents, in afterwards instructing the children! What a plea in prayer for them! And might not infant baptism be improved to similar purposes, did all, who approve and contend for it, bestow true pains to make it a means of grace to themselves and those concerned? (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 10:13—16.)

V. 16—22. We learn from St. Luke, that the young person here mentioned was a "ruler;" (Luke 18:18.) he was also a person of great decency and amiableness in his moral character, and had serious thoughts about religion, and an honourable opinion of Christ. He therefore came "running;" and kneeling down to him, (Mark 10:17.) he called him "good Master," or Teacher; and with great apparent earnestness and docility inquired, "What good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life?" The question at first sight may seem equivalent to the inquiry of the trembling jailer, "What must I do to be saved?" (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Luke 10:25—29. Acts 16:29—34, v. 31.) But our Lord saw that his judgment was erroneous, and his heart unhumbled and carnal: he therefore first objected to his giving him, whom he supposed to be a mere Man, the title of good: as all mere men are evil in themselves: and none is strictly and absolutely good, but the one living and true God, the Fountain and Perfection of goodness and excellency. The remark was the more needful, as the Rabbies affected this title: and it intimated, that the inquirer was not properly sensible of the depravity of his own heart, or of the dignity of the person whom he thus addressed, to whom the title of "good" belonged, in a far higher sense than he supposed. He then directed him to keep the commandments of God, if he purposed "to enter into life," by the good things which he should do. This answer was doubtless intended to meet the young man's case: for the knowledge of the holy and spiritual law of God is the proper cure of a self-justifying spirit, as it tends to discover the deficiencies and defilements of all human obedience: (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Rom. 3:19,20. 7:9—12. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 19.) but probably he expected some external observances and austerities to have been superadded by our Lord, in order to complete his righteousness. (Notes, Rom. 9:30—33, v. 32. 10:1—4, v. 3.) He therefore ignorantly replied, by inquiring which of the commandments he was to keep, whereas, a perfect obedience to all of them is the indispensable condition of life, according to the covenant of works; and "cursed is every one, that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law, to do them." (Note, Gal. 3:10—14.) In order therefore to his conviction, or detection, our Lord pointed out to him the commandments of the second table and summed them up in the rule of "loving his neighbour as himself." But he, regardless of the first table, and ignorant of the spiritual import of the precepts adduced, answered, that "he had kept them all from his youth." He could mean the letter alone, and that he was free from the grosser violations of it: for doubtless he had infringed several of them, even in his outward conduct; and he certainly was very far from "loving his neighbour as himself." On his further asking "What lack I yet?" our Lord, to discover to him and others, the evil which lay concealed under these plausible appearances, told him, that he yet lacked one thing; and that if he would be perfect, he must go and sell his estate, distribute the money among the poor, and come and follow him; and then he should have a far better treasure in heaven. (Marg. Ref. k.—s. Notes, Mark 10:17—31, vv. 17,19,21. Luke 18:18—30.) This was acting like a skilful physician, who was aware of the patient's disorder, and determined to apply the medicine directly to it. It served at once to prove him far distant from the righteousness of the law, and from the state of mind and heart required by the gospel. Not to enlarge on the love of God with all the heart and soul; had he "loved his neighbour as himself," and believed Jesus to speak with divine authority, he would readily have disposed of his wealth, at his command, in relieving the afflicted, when at the same time it would have ensured his own felicity: and had he been an humbled sinner, earnestly seeking mercy and eternal life, as the gift of God through the divine Saviour, he would readily have left all to follow him. But the event proved, that his wealth was more valued by him, than either God or his neighbour; than Christ, a heavenly treasure, or even his own soul. Doubtless it was his duty to yield a prompt obedience to this command: yet our Lord knew that he would not, and it is evident he intended it as a touchstone, by which to discover him to himself. For when he heard that saying, all his pleasing prospects at once vanished, and he departed "sorrowful, for he had great possessions." Though reluctant to give up the hope of eternal life, yet he would not at that time renounce his riches for the sake of it. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—We cannot decide what he afterwards did: he might at length be brought to a more spiritual frame of mind. Certainly all that Christ said to him was suited to humble and convince him; and some would infer his subsequent conversion from the words of St. Mark, who says that Jesus loved him: though this may only mean, that he saw a natural amiableness, which excited in him, as man, a peculiar regard. (Note, Mark 10:17—31, vv. 21,22.)—The reference to the ten commandments, accords both to the Hebrew and the LXX; except as the fifth commandment is placed last, and part of it omitted.

V. 23—26. This incident afforded our Lord an occasion of showing the extreme peril of riches. He observed, as one in astonishment, "That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven," or become his true subject and disciple. (Notes, 3:2. John 3:3—5.) And he added, with affectionate application to the apostles as his children, that it "was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Mark 10:17—31, v. 24.) Some would read a cable, instead of a camel: but it seems to have been a proverbial expression, signifying extreme difficulty or apparent impossibility.—Riches powerfully tend to increase pride, covetousness, and self-indulgence: they purchase flatterers, and exclude faithful reprovers; they prejudice the mind against the humbling truths and self-denying precepts of Christ; and they increase the number and force of those obstacles which must be broken through, and the supposed value of those objects which must be renounced, if a man would become a disciple of Christ. Far more in proportion of the poor, than of the rich, are converted, and enter the kingdom of grace and of glory; and the conversion of a very wealthy man seems the peculiar triumph of almighty grace. (Notes, Luke 12:15—21. 16:9—15. 19—23. 19:1—10. 1 Tim. 6:6—10. vv. 9,10,17—19. Jam. 1:9—11. 2:5—7.) The disciples, however, who were poor and felt their own difficulties, and probably thought that the rich had more advantages for religion than themselves, were exceedingly astonished at this saying, and exclaimed, "Who then can be saved?" But Jesus, to show them he did not mean that all rich persons must be lost, but to warn them against the desire of such dangerous distinctions, assured them, that "with men indeed it was impossible, but with God all things were possible." (Marg. Ref. b.)

V. 27, 28. The young ruler's departure from our Lord, and his observation upon it, led Peter to recollect that he and the other apostles had actually left all to follow him; and it seems to have excited some degree of self-complacency. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 4:18—22. 9:9.) With his usual forwardness, he therefore reminded Jesus of this, and inquired what reward they should receive. Indeed Peter's "all," had been only a few fishing nets, a boat, and other things of small value: yet they were the means of obtaining a decent maintenance; and the same faith, which induced him to renounce them for Christ's sake, would have led him to make larger sacrifices, if he had been called to it, as he afterwards was. Our Lord, therefore, overlooked what was wrong, and assured the apostles, that they "who had followed him in the regeneration," should at length be advanced and honoured in a peculiar manner. If we join the expression, "in the regeneration," to the preceding clause, it may mean the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit on their hearts, disposing them to obey his call. But it may, and probably should, be joined to the subsequent clause; and then it refers to the time, when the apostles would receive their full recompense, even "when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory." (25:31.) Then he will make all things new: and they will be his assessors in judgment; the world and the church will be judged according to their doctrine; and they will appear distinguished in an especial manner from all their brethren in Christ. (Notes, 16:19. 18:18. 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) Some reference may perhaps be had to the establishment of the Christian church, and the condemnation of the Jewish nation in consequence of their ministry: but the day of judgment seems immediately intended. Judas was at this time one of the number; but he had never truly left all and followed Christ: when "he by transgression fell," another was appointed in his place, and the number twelve was continued, with reference to the twelve tribes of which Israel was originally constituted.—'In the day of the great restoration of all things, when the elect shall enter on a new life of unspeakable glory, even in that great and dreadful day, when "the Son of man shall sit upon his throne of majesty, to judge the quick and the dead;" then shall ye, my apostles, who are now despicable and mean, have the honour to sit upon several thrones, to second and assist this awful act of final judgment on the rebellious tribes of Israel.' Bp. Hall. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, 25:31—33. Luke 22:28—30. 1 Cor. 6: 1—6.)

Regeneration. (28) Παλιγγενεσια. Tit. 3:5. Not elsewhere used.

V. 29, 30. Though a peculiar dignity would be reserved to the apostles; yet every one, who had forsaken or should forsake any temporal possession, or relative comfort, for the sake of Christ and of the gospel, would "receive an hundredfold" increase of happiness for it, even in this life, (notwithstanding the persecutions to which he would be exposed,) as well as inherit eternal life at last. (Notes, Mark 10:27—31, v. 30. Luke 18:18—30, v. 30.) This must be understood especially of divine consolations, which commonly most abound when great sacrifices are made, or great hardships endured, for conscience' sake; and which are a hundred-fold better, than all earthly comforts and possessions; as they best know who have most experienced them. But those providential interpositions may also be included, by which the Lord often makes up, in outward comforts of a far more valuable nature, all the losses and privations voluntarily incurred by his true disciples, in adhering to him, and obeying his commands: for evidently the promise has respect to all times and places. 'A full content of mind, the comforts of an upright conscience, the joys of the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and hopes of glory; and shall have God for their Father, and be rich towards God, and have Christ for their Spouse, and all good Christians bearing that warm affection to them, which will render them more closely united to, and more affectionately concerned for them, than those who were allied to them by the strictest

He doubtless referred to the moral and amiable young man, who was found on trial to be "further from the kingdom of Heaven," than many publicans and harlots, who became "first," when he was cast behind: but the rule has reference to a variety of cases. Prodigals often repent, and get before decent moralists: the Gentile converts obtained the priority to the Jewish nation: splendid hypocrites apostatize, and open persecutors become preachers of the gospel: and those, who have been the grief and reproach of families and neighbourhoods, sometimes become their chief credit and blessing; whilst plausible characters are by this very circumstance rendered more inveterate against the truth. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 20:1—16. 21:28—32.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. We are again called to follow, with our meditations, the divine Saviour, as "he went about doing good," and "endured the contradiction of sinners against himself:" let us not fail to look earnestly unto him, that we may not be wearied in well-doing, by the ingratitude and perverseness of our fellow-sinners.—Human depravity has deranged the appointments of the all-wise Creator, and perverted them to the introduction of accumulated misery; and the unjust oppressors share the consequences with those whom they cruelly oppress: but the gospel is intended to soften the hard heart, and meliorate the harsh spirits of men; as well as to regulate their passions and subdue their iniquities. When it is really embraced, its sacred energy renders men affectionate relatives and faithful friends: it teaches them to "bear with the infirmities," and "to bear the burdens," of those with whom they are connected; and to consider their interest, peace, and happiness, more than their own indulgence or convenience. This will reduce marriage, in good measure, to its original institution; and teach the parties concerned to regulate their conduct respecting it by the law of God, and not by their own humour, passion, or caprice. The true Christian will consider his wife, as the gift and appointment of the Lord; and his union with her as God's ordinance: he will learn to love her as his own flesh; and no more want a separation on every gust of passion or incidental uneasiness, than he would desire to have his limb cut off, or his flesh mangled, every time he feels pain or weariness. This he regards as a desperate and most painful remedy, in case of an incurable gangrene. He will consider the regulations of the divine law, as the dictates of wisdom and love, and every deviation as a source of temptation and disquietude, and the bane of domestic felicity; and he will perceive that this view of the marriage union, as indissoluble, and as an inseparable conjunction of interests and comforts till death, gives the most effectual motives to persevering endeavours for mutual peace and harmony. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) Should a Christian even be united with an unconverted person, (which is indeed a heavy affliction,) he will see it best to take it up as his cross, and to submit to the will of God in thus correcting him; endeavouring to extract good from it, and expecting grace sufficient to support him under it: this he will perceive to be far preferable to any irregular method of dissolving the union. As to ungodly persons, it is proper, that their passions should be so restrained by human laws, formed according to the law of God, that they may not prove injurious to the peace of society. It does not indeed follow, that "if the case of a man be so with his wife, it is" generally "not good to marry:" but it certainly proves, that men should enter into this state with great seriousness, consideration, and fervent prayer; that they should not form the indissoluble union with one whose external appearance or riches are the chief recommendation; and that Christians should be very careful not to be "unequally yoked with unbelievers." (Notes, Prov. 18:22. 19:13,14. 31:10—12.) As to the rest, our gracious Lord has imposed upon us no rigorous restrictions; but has left each of his disciples to choose that state of life, in which he can serve God, and mind the concerns of his soul, with most comfort and least distraction: and his condescending and considerate statement of this difficult subject forms a proper example for his people to imitate, in their conduct towards one another.

V. 13—15. The training up of children in true religion, is one grand design of God in marriage; and it behooves all men to have respect to this in every step they take about it. And all Christians should, by faith and prayer, bring their children to the gracious Saviour, at their birth, and even before it, that he may bless them with all his spiritual blessings. Whether they deem it right to devote their infant offspring to him in baptism, or form other conclusions on that controverted subject; they should certainly agree, in giving them up to him, and bringing them up for him. In attending to these important duties, we may take encouragement from the very rebuke which Christ gave his disciples, and from his readiness to grant the desire of these parents for their children: nor can we much doubt, that he really received and blessed them, as the lambs of his flock. Whilst we teach our children, as they become capable of learning, how ready the condescending Son of God is to answer their lisping petitions, and to accept of them as his disciples; we may be well satisfied, that he has taken to his heavenly kingdom such of them as have died in infancy: for doubtless the covenant is made with the believer, for the good of this part of his offspring in an especial manner. If then Christian parents have their beloved branches cropt in the bud, they cannot surely have cause to complain; or to think much of their pain, care, or trouble, when they are made the instruments of God in raising up children to him, who may inherit his everlasting kingdom.

V. 16—22. It is necessary that we inculcate on those who are put under our care not only a decency of moral conduct, and an external regard to religion, but an attention to the gospel as the only remedy for lost sinners: otherwise they may appear very amiable, serious, and earnest about eternal life; yea, they may show some respect to Christ and his precepts; and yet never know their need of his precious salvation. Many abstain from gross vices through pride, and regard to character, interest, health, or outward peace; but remain entirely inattentive to their obligations towards God, and rest in the outward letter of the commandments, which respect their neighbours: and they are ready to say, "All these have I kept from my youth;" when ten thousand instances of disobedience, in thought, word, and deed, are marked against them in the book of God, to be produced to their conviction and confusion at the day of judgment.—Indeed, no man can enter into life, who does not habitually aim to keep the commandments of God; and wilful, customary transgression will prove many professors of the gospel to be further from the kingdom of heaven, than even this ruler. But "there is none righteous, no not one:" it is therefore proper sometimes to task self-sufficient inquirers; and when they proudly ask, "what lack I yet?" to point out to them more and more of their duty, according to the spiritual and extensive law of God. This may lead them into an acquaintance with their own weakness and depravity, and detect the secret pride and worldliness of their hearts; and so prepare the way for their understanding and welcoming the gospel of free salvation. Not only does the law require us (if Providence call us to it), to part with our substance, or even our lives, for the glory of God, and the good of our neighbours: but except a man be ready to forsake all that he has for Christ's sake, he cannot be his disciple, or be saved according to the gospel. No unregenerate man will comply either with the precept of the law, or the requisition of Christ, when he is fairly put to the trial. In this manner, numbers "forsake him, loving this present world:" they have their convictions and desires, but the sacrifice insisted on is too valuable; therefore they depart sorrowful, perhaps trembling. This is peculiarly the case with those who have great possessions, and who live in trying times. Few in comparison of the numbers of those "who call Christ, Lord, Lord," seem prepared for obedience, should he require them to "sell all and give to the poor, and come and follow him, that they may have a treasure in heaven." Many refuse, at his express command, to part with the most trivial interest or indulgence: many will not give even a moderate proportion of their goods to the poor, notwithstanding all the promises made to those, who do this out of faith, and love to Christ. It behooves us then to try ourselves in these matters, for the Lord will ere long put us to the trial; and then, if found wanting, we must abide the eternal and awful consequences.

V. 23—30. Nothing more fully proves men's want of true faith, than their eagerness to be rich, though Christ has spoken in so alarming a manner, concerning the additional danger, to which riches expose their precious souls. Yet how few are there who do not labour to be rich, and to enrich their children? Who does not associate the idea of wealth with that of felicity? Who that has riches does not confide in them as a substantial advantage? And who that is poor is not tempted to envy the wealthy? But experience fatally confirms the declarations of Christ; and proves that this earnestness is like toiling to build a high wall, to shut themselves and their children out of heaven: for in this manner, many "that will be rich, fall into fatal snares," and involve their families in every kind of ruinous temptation, to their everlasting perdition.—(Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10.) CHAPTER XX.

Jesus speaks a parable of labourers sent at different hours into a vineyard, and applies it, 1—16. He foretells his own death and resurrection, 17—19; rejects the request of the mother of James and John in behalf of her sons; and represses the indignation and ambition of the other apostles, 20—28; and gives sight to two blind men, 29—34.

FOR [a]the kingdom of heaven is like unto [b]a man that is an householder, which went out [c]early in the morning to hire [d]labourers into his vineyard.

2 And when [e]he had agreed with the labourers for [f]a penny a day, [f]he sent them into his vineyard.

3 And he went out about [g]the third hour, and [g]saw others [h]standing idle in the market-place.

4 And said unto them, [i]Go ye also into the vineyard, [k]and whatsoever is right I will give you. And they went their way.

5 Again he went out about the [l]sixth and ninth hour, [m]and did likewise.

6 And about [n]the eleventh hour he went out, and found others standing idle, and saith unto them, Why stand ye here all the day idle?

7 They say unto him, [o]Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, [p]Go ye also into the vineyard; [q]and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive.

8 So [r]when even was come, the lord of the vineyard saith [s]unto his steward, Call the labourers, and give them their hire, beginning from the last unto the first.

9 And when they came that were hired about the eleventh hour, [t]they received every man a penny.

10 But when the first came, they supposed that they should have received more; and they likewise received every man a penny.

11 And when they had received it, [u]they murmured against the good-man of the house, 12 Saying, These last have [v]wrought but one hour, and thou hast made them [x]equal unto us, which have [y]borne the burden and heat of the day.

13 But he answered one of them, and said, [z]Friend, [a]I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny?

14 Take that [b]thine is, and go thy way: I will give unto this last, even as unto thee.

15 Is [c]it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? [d]Is thine eye evil, [e]because I am good?

16 So [f]the last shall be first, and the first last: [g]for many be called, but few chosen.

[Marg. Ref. a—f:) the main scope of the parable respects the dealings of God with men according to the gospel, and vindicates him from the charge of injustice and partiality.—[t] As some ... careful householder, that has hired labourers, at a set rate, into his vineyard; calling in other workmen at the latter end of the day, is pleased to give an equal retribution to those that came latest into the vineyard, with those that came at first: making good his promise and agreement with the first, while he is bountiful unto the latter; cannot be challenged to have done any wrong to the first, in his liberality to the last: even so God, the great Master of this earthly family, having called some more early to the service and profession of his name, some later; if he shall give a like gracious remuneration to all, cannot justly be excepted against; since, if some have cause to magnify his bounty, yet no man has cause to complain.' Bp. Hall.—Some expositors refer the different hours of the day, to several periods in the history of the church from the beginning; and others, to the times when a remnant of the Jews, and afterwards the Gentiles, were brought into the Christian church: but it is very difficult, at least, to make the circumstances of the parable in any measure accord to these events. With more plausibility and utility, they may be applied to the conversion of sinners, at the earlier and later stages of human life: for thus indeed one man does serve the Lord longer than another does. (Marg. Ref. g—o.) Yet this must not be strained too far: for it would be absurd to suppose, that any real Christians, at the great day of account, will murmur at the appointments of the Judge, or boast of their own services. It is, therefore, rather a description of the state of the visible church, and an illustration of the maxim, "The last shall be first, and the first last," in all its bearings. Many outwardly embrace Christianity, who are not made humble and spiritual: many real Christians who have been early converted, and preserved from outward vices, do not, for a time, understand the case of their fellow-ser-tions will not only offend unbelievers: even disciples will be astonished at them, and be ready to think that none then can be saved. Indeed, not many of the rich and honourable of the earth are called, but the people of God are generally found among the poor; and the difficulties in the way of the wealthy sinner's conversion are so many, and so insurmountable by man, that we should have no hope of him, except as we know that "with God all things are possible." And, blessed be his name, he surprises us with some demonstrations of the omnipotence of his grace, even in these degenerate days: here and there, a very wealthy person is brought forth, and appears eminent for humility, simplicity, spirituality, and fruitfulness: some of this kind are even found among those, who are growing rich from inferior circumstances; but none among those that "will be rich," or who trust, idolize, or love riches. What we here read, however, should surely make us willing to be poor, to beware of covetousness, and to pity and pray for the rich; as we would for men at sea in a violent storm, whom nothing but an extraordinary interposition of God could save, from being swallowed up by the tempestuous waves: and in all our labours of love, we may still apply this rule, even to the most abandoned and hardened, that "with God all things are possible." But whether a man have a kingdom, or only a fishing-boat; if he be duly humbled as a sinner, and earnestly seek eternal life from the Saviour, he will, at his call, leave all and follow him; and if he be allowed to keep his substance, he will learn to use it in his service. Indeed, mixtures of self-preference often tarnish our conscious integrity, and our gratitude to him "who hath made us to differ:" yet our gracious Lord accepts his own work, and pardons our evil; and if we here follow him with simplicity, he will at length cause us to inherit "a crown of glory that fadeth not away." Nay, he has promised most abundantly to recompense us, for all that we give up for his sake; so that it is only like sowing seed, with the assurance, even in this world, of reaping an hundred-fold; as well as of eternal life in that which is to come. May he then give us faith to lay hold of his promise, and rest our hope on him; and then we shall be prepared for every service or sacrifice. But let us neither trust in promising appearances, or in outward profession; nor despair of such as are fallen the deepest into immorality, impiety, or infidelity: seeing "many of the first shall be last, and the last first;" and the chief of sinners may, for what we know, become most eminent in faith and holiness.

NOTES.—CHAP. XX. V. 1—16. This parable was intended to illustrate the equity of the Lord's dealings, even when "the first are placed last, and the last first." (19:30.) In this respect, "the kingdom of heaven" resembles a householder, when he hires labourers to work in his vineyard. He goes very early in the morning, according to the custom at that time, and in some places at present, to some known place, whither those who desired to be employed used to resort, "to hire labourers;" and, bargaining with certain persons at the usual price of a denarius a day, (about seven pence halfpenny, or eight pence, Note, Rev 6:5,6;) he sends them immediately to work. But he also goes afterwards about nine o'clock, at noon, at three in the afternoon, and about an hour before sunset; and he finds persons unemployed, whom he sends into his vineyard, with a general assurance, that he would give them what was right or equitable. When even is come, he gives order to his steward to pay the labourers; and as those who were sent to the work at the latest hour are paid first, and receive a full day's wages: the others, especially those who had gone to work early in the morning, expect to receive more: and, being disappointed, they murmur as i. injustice were done them. But the master shows that they were not injured; that they had their whole due, while the others had more than theirs; that it was reasonable for him to dispose of his own property as he saw good; that their objections arose from envy and selfishness, excited by his goodness; and that he certainly should continue his bounty to the others, notwithstanding their murmurs. And then our Lord assured the disciples, that thus "the last shall be first, and the first last; for many be called, but few chosen."—In interpreting the parable, the grand scope ought principally to be adverted to. The church, as represented by a vineyard, the employment of the servants, and their wages, with several other particulars, are only circumstances: (Marg. Ref. a—f:) the main scope of the parable respects the dealings of God with men according to the gospel, and vindicates him from the charge of injustice and partiality.—[t] As some ... careful householder, that has hired labourers, at a set rate, into his vineyard; calling in other workmen at the latter end of the day, is pleased to give an equal retribution to those that came latest into the vineyard, with those that came at first: making good his promise and agreement with the first, while he is bountiful unto the latter; cannot be challenged to have done any wrong to the first, in his liberality to the last: even so God, the great Master of this earthly family, having called some more early to the service and profession of his name, some later; if he shall give a like gracious remuneration to all, cannot justly be excepted against; since, if some have cause to magnify his bounty, yet no man has cause to complain.' *Bp. vants who are called at a later hour. Men are apt to overrate their own services, and to derogate from those of their neighbours. Innumerable objections are started against the methods of divine grace: the Jews could not endure the admission of the Gentiles to share all the privileges of the people of God; though there was no difference, save that they were called at a later period into the vineyard: the elder brother thought himself wronged, when the prodigal was welcomed home: (Note, and P. O. Luke 15:25—32.) the Pharisees were offended at Christ's attention to publicans and harlots: (See on Note, 19:29,30.—Notes, 9:9—13. Luke 7:37—39. 15:1,2.) and the freeness of salvation to "the chief of sinners," has always stumbled moralists and formalists, who boast of having "borne the burden and heat of the day." But such objections are easily answered: the Lord punishes none above their deserts; and recompenses, in one way or other, every service which is performed for him: he does no injustice to any, by showing extraordinary grace to some: and he will, at the close of the day, if not before, convince all the world of his own equity, truth, and goodness, and of the pride, ignorance, and selfishness of these murmurers. He will prove his right to "do what he will with his own," to the full satisfaction of his friends, and the final confusion of every one whose "eye is evil because he is good." He will fulfil his largest promises to each believer, in whatever period of the church, or in whatever time of his life, he becomes "a labourer in the vineyard:" and he will show, that in real grace, as well as in privilege and consolation, many who are latest converted, exceed those who have been longer in the service of Christ. But the concluding sentence evidently shows, that professors of religion in general were especially intended, and that they were addressed according to their own opinion of themselves, and not according to the real state of their souls. (Marg. Ref. u—d.)—There is a parable, not wholly dissimilar, in the Jewish Talmud; and some Christian expositors seem to think, that our Lord took this from what was then extant of it; but omitted some things, which they seem to think ought to be added in order to a right understanding of the subject! especially, that the labourers, who came late into the vineyard, were so diligent, that in a short time they performed as much as the others had done in the whole day; and were "chosen," because known to be men of remarkable industry. This is supposed to be necessary in order to make the parable consist with every man being rewarded according to his works. But Dr. Doddridge has very justly called the parable of the Talmudists, 'an insipid imitation:' and we may add, that it is a perversion of the parable before us, in opposition to the grand principles of the gospel. The nature and motives of our works, and not merely the quantity, must be taken into the account at the great day; and the reward be made accordingly: (Notes, 25:34—40. Rom. 2:4—11. 2 Cor. 5:10—12.) but this is not the immediate subject of the parable, which has above been fully shown.

V. 17—19. (Marg Ref.) 'Humanly speaking, it was much more probable, that Jesus should have been privately assassinated, or stoned, as was before attempted, ... than that he should have been thus solemnly condemned, and delivered up to crucifixion. ... But "all this was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled."' Doddridge.—'Christ goeth to the cross necessarily, but yet willingly.' Beza. (Notes, 16:21—23. Mark 9:30—32. 10:32—34.)

They shall deliver, &c. (19) Παραδωσουσιν. The same verb just before translated betrayed. (18) It was as much treason for the rulers and priests to deliver up their King into the hands of Pilate to be crucified; as it had been in Judas, to deliver him up into their hands.

V. 20—23. Perhaps Zebedee, the father of James and John, was dead before this time, or he was not so constant a follower of Christ as his wife was; so that she is mentioned as "the mother of Zebedee's children." (Note, 4:18—22, vv. 21,22.)—At their desire, in their name, and with them, she prostrated herself before Christ, and besought him to grant her one request; seeming to expect, that he would engage his word before the petition was made. (Notes, 1 Kings 2:14—20. 3:5—14. Esth. 5:1—3.) When required to propose it, she asked that her two sons might have the chief places of honour and authority in his kingdom. (Marg. Ref. x.) Our Lord had just before been discoursing of his sufferings, death, and resurrection; but the apostles were too blinded by carnal prejudices, in that particular, to understand his meaning. They were, however, continually expecting that he would appear in his glory; and probably Salome (Marg. Ref. r.) had respect to the twelve thrones which he had promised to the apostles; (19,28;) the two principal of which she wished to engage for her sons; being emboldened to make such a request, by the special favour which our Lord had shown to them. But Jesus told her and them, that they knew neither the nature, nor the consequences, of their request: for the chief preferments which he had to bestow, would expose those who obtained them to the largest share of suffering. He therefore demanded, whether they were able to drink of his cup, and to be baptized with his baptism. He was about to be betrayed, condemned, scourged, mocked, and crucified: and were they prepared to drink after him of this cup, and to be initiated into his service by this baptism? Either they did not duly attend to the meaning of the question, or they had too great a confidence in themselves, when they answered, that "they were able." He assured them, however, that they would be called thus to follow him, through sufferings and persecutions, and that they would be enabled to endure them for his sake; but that the highest honours of his kingdom were not now to be disposed of by him, to gratify the ambition of any favourite: in this sense, they were not his to give, as Mediator, "save to those, for whom they had been prepared of the Father," for that concern had been previously determined, in perfect harmony between the Father and the Son.—The words in Italics, "it shall be given," rather obscure the meaning, and may well be spared.—James was the first of the apostles who suffered martyrdom: John survived all the rest, and is not supposed to have died a violent death. He, however, endured hardships and persecutions, stripes, contempt, and suffering, from the enmity of the world, for the sake of Christ and the gospel; and thus it may be said, that he drank of Christ's cup, and was baptized with his baptism.—Our Lord might indeed, by a strong figure of speech, be said to have been immerged in sufferings, when he endured the wrath of God as the propitiation for our sins; but the lighter afflictions of the apostles, connected with abundant joys and consolation, must be allowed, in this sense, to have been another and a far milder kind of baptism than his. (Marg. Ref. a—d. V. 24—28. The other apostles were as ambitious of the chief places in the kingdom as James and John, notwithstanding our Lord's former discourse on this subject. They were therefore angry with the two brothers, for taking an undue advantage in this contested point. (Marg. Ref. f.) But Jesus, aware of their resentment and ambition, was pleased to argue the case with them. He showed them the difference between his kingdom, and the kingdoms of the nations. "The princes of the Gentiles" indeed were ambitious of lordly authority, in order to gratify their love of domineering, and of being flattered and had in honour; and every inferior ruler copied their example: but this resulted from false notions of greatness, and from the pride of the human heart. Such a conduct, however, might consist with the character of conquerors and tyrants, and rulers who know not God: but it was wholly unsuitable to the governors of God's people, and most of all to the spiritual pastors of his flock. It must not be at all the case with them: instead of aspiring to dominion, and "lording it over God's heritage;" he who would indeed be "great among them," must become the menial servant of the whole company; and stoop to the lowest and most laborious employments, in order to be the more useful. This humility, self-abasement, and diligence would at length render him the chief: whilst a contrary conduct would tend to a man's disgrace and degradation. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, 18:1—4. Mark 10:35—45, vv. 42—44. Luke 22:24—27. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) Of this way to be chief in the kingdom, he had and would set them an example: he appeared among them as "the Son of man," not to assume external authority, and "to be ministered to" by courtiers and dependents: but to be a Servant to them, and to all who would require of him any thing conducive to their good. And, after spending his days in this manner, he was about to lay down his life as a ransom for the souls of multitudes, even of all that should ever believe in his name; "suffering once for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." (Marg. Ref. n—p. Notes, John 1:29. 1 Tim. 2:5—7. Heb. 9:27,28. 1 Pet. 3:17, 18. 1 John 2:1,2.)—This does not prove that Christians must not be kings or rulers; but it fully demonstrates, that they must not be ambitious and tyrannical. Government and discipline are also necessary to the church: but lordly power, the pride of life, dominion over conscience, and the spirit of persecution, are not necessary to its rulers, under any form of government; nay, totally incompatible with the spirit of the gospel, though, alas! too common in most ages and places.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. The pride of the human heart, and its enmity to the sovereignty of God, render it very difficult to convince men of the justice and goodness of his dispensations: yet nothing can be more certain, than that "he is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works." This may be evidently proved, in respect of those parts of his plan with which we are acquainted; if we impartially judge of them, according to the rules established in human society, for the conduct of men towards subjects, servants, and dependents, and for the disposal of their property.—In every age, the great Owner of the vineyard comes, by his ministers, to "hire labourers;" and he condescends to take those who have been rebels against him and servants to another master; and, having pardoned and reconciled them, he sends them into his vineyard, to labour in their several stations, to promote the common cause of his church. Those who are early in life called by his grace, and yield themselves to his service, are peculiarly favoured; for "his yoke is easy, and his burden is light." (Note, 11:28—30.) They may deem themselves happy in being preserved from doing mischief, and from forming bad habits and connexions: and in being early habituated to do good, and associated with "the excellent of the earth." (Note, Ec. 12:1.) Yet those who have wasted their youth in vanity and sin, are invited to enter the Lord's service at a later period: and the case of those who have not before heard the gospel, but have loitered, "because no man hath hired them," is far more hopeful than that of such as have long withstood the invitations of the word, and the convictions of their own conscience. We are, however, authorized even to the eleventh hour, to remonstrate with those who "stand all the day idle," and call upon them to enter the Lord's vineyard; assuring them, that "whatever is right, that they shall receive." To the end of life, it is written over mercy's gate, "Knock, and it shall be opened:" but life is uncertain, and it is madness for men to procrastinate, when they know not how soon death may for ever bar the door, and leave them to everlasting and unavailing lamentations and despair.—Whether men enter early in the morning, or at the eleventh hour, they will spend the subsequent part of their lives in "the work of the Lord;" and thus evince the sincerity of their repentance, faith, and love; and prove their interest in "the gift of God, which is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—The exceeding riches of divine grace excite loud murmurs among proud Pharisees and nominal Christians; for many are called into the visible church, who do not belong to "the remnant according to the election of grace:" and many perform outward services to God, who have never humbly submitted to his righteousness, his sovereignty, and his authority. All their performances are therefore leavened with self-preference: and their objections to the Lord's gracious dealings with publicans and prodigals, their boasts, and their complaining of "the burden and heat of the day," betray the mercenary or the slave; and savour not at all of "the spirit of adoption," the loving temper of a child, who keeps his father's commandments, and counts them not grievous. (Note, 1 John 5:1—3, v. 3.) First or last, the mouths of all such objectors will be stopped; and it will be well for them if it be in this world: for the Lord will, at the great day of retribution, prove to the whole universe the equity of his procedure; and silence all who murmur against him for "doing what he will with his own," though they assume that privilege themselves, with what he has intrusted to them. Then it will appear, that many who were first in morality and profession, were in their hearts at enmity with God: whilst the late convert will, in many instances, be shown to have "loved much," and to have been humble and diligent, in proportion to the greatness of his obligations and unworthiness. Let us then remember, that we are all condemned criminals; and that our wise and righteous Sovereign does no one any injustice, and that he dispenses his unmerited favours as he sees good: let us forego every proud claim, and seek salvation as a free gift: and let us never envy or grudge; but always rejoice and praise God, for every display of his mercy to the vilest of our fellow-sinners.

V. 17—23. A believing view of our once crucified, and now glorified Redeemer, is the great antidote to a proud, self-justifying disposition. When we consider what need there was of the humiliation and sufferings of the Son of God, in order to the salvation of sinners; and when we recollect the willingness, meekness, constancy, and patience, with which the Redeemer endured the insults and cruelty of men and the wrath of God for us; we cannot but feel our self-sufficiency abate, and be sensible of the unspeakable freeness and riches

CHAPTER XXI.

Jesus enters Jerusalem on an ass's colt, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, 1—11. He drives the buyers and sellers out of the temple; heals the blind and lame; and answers the objections of the priests, 12—16. He causes the barren fig-tree to wither; and shows the disciples the power of faith and prayer, 17—22. He silences those who demand by what authority he acted, 23—27; and exposes the wickedness, and predicts the doom, of the priests and rulers, by a parable of two sons, 28—32, and by that of a vineyard let out to husbandmen, 33—46.

AND [a]when they drew nigh unto Jerusalem, and were come to Bethphage, unto [b]the mount of Olives, then sent Jesus two disciples,

2 Saying unto them, [c]Go into the village over against you, and straightway ye shall find an ass tied, and a colt with her: loose them, and bring them unto me.

3 And if any man say aught unto you, ye shall say, [d]The Lord hath need of them; [e]and straightway he will send them.

4 All [f]this was done, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, [g]saying,

5 Tell ye, [h]the daughter of Sion, Behold, [i]thy King cometh unto thee, [k]meek, and [l]sitting upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass.

6 And the disciples went, [m]and did as Jesus commanded them;

7 And [n]brought the ass and the colt, and [o]put on them their clothes, and they set him thereon.

8 And a very great multitude spread their garments in the way; [p]others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way.

9 And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, [q]Hosanna to the Son of David: [r]blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna [s]in the highest!

10 And when he was come into Jerusalem, [t]all the city was moved, saying, [u]Who is this?

11 And the multitude said, [x]This is Jesus the prophet [y]of Nazareth of Galilee.

of divine grace in our salvation.—Yet with what strange indifference do even disciples sometimes read, hear, or speak of these interesting topics! especially when Satan tempts them to aspire after "the honour that cometh from man."—If we ask such things as are truly good for us or others, God will not refuse our request: but when we pray, under the influence of pride, avarice, or any other passion, we "know not what we ask;" we mistake poison for food or medicine: and if he loves us, he will withhold from us what we foolishly crave.—If we would at last be conformed to our glorified Lord, we must be willing here to have fellowship with him in his sufferings; we must pass through tribulations and reproach; we must drink in some measure of his bitter cup, and experience some degree of his afflictive baptism: yet how light, and mingled with comfort, are our sharpest trials, compared with the unmixed agony and anguish which he endured for us! Possessing a good hope of being admitted to the felicity of heaven, we shall be satisfied with the thought, that it will be "according as it is prepared for us by our heavenly Father." And, even in this world, it becomes us indeed to be earnest about growth in grace, and diligence and fruitfulness, the redemption of our time and the improvement of our talents, and usefulness in the lowest station in the church; but not about pre-eminence among our brethren.

V. 24—34. Alas! how have ambition and envy moved professed Christians to indignation against each other, and sown contentions among brethren, in every age! And what enormous mischiefs have arisen, from church rulers and pastors exercising dominion after the manner of the kings, nay, tyrants of the nations; or indeed with more atrocious pride, cruelty, and iniquity. (P. O. Rev. 18:9—19.) Carnal men thus seek to be the greatest: but those Christians and ministers are in reality the chief, and most honourable, and will be deemed so by all competent judges, who stoop the lowest, labour the most diligently, and suffer with most entire meekness and patience, in seeking to do good to their brethren, and to promote the salvation of souls. They most resemble him, "who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many;" and will be most honoured by him to all eternity. Yet, so deceitful is the heart, that those who sincerely avow the determination of leaving all for Christ's sake, and in hope of an eternal and gracious recompense; and who have actually given up many things on these accounts; may yet, like the apostles on this occasion, have secret expectations of honour and importance among their brethren; which various circumstances detect, and which should always be watched against. But an humble sense of our own indigence, unworthiness, and misery, and exalted apprehensions of the Saviour's power and grace, are in some respects the standard of human excellency, and the source of human felicity. However poor, ignorant, weak, and sinful that man may be, who thus humbly seeks to Christ for help, he will be earnest in proportion as his applications are discouraged; he will cry the more vehemently, when men would require him to "hold his peace;" and the Lord will at length attend to him and answer his petitions; he will compassionate his sorrows, open his eyes, supply his wants, and forgive his sins; and thus enable him to join the number of his followers, and "to show forth his praises, who hath called him out of darkness into his marvellous light."

NOTES.—CHAP. XXI. V. 1—5. Several events, especially the resurrection of Lazarus from the dead, intervened before those recorded in this chapter, which occurred no more than five days before our Lord's crucifixion. (Notes, John 11: 12:1—11.) In his last journey to Jerusalem, he lodged at Bethany; and then proceeded on the road towards the city, to the extremity of that village, or rather to a part of the mount of Olives, which lay between it and Bethphage. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) From thence he sent two of his disciples to the village over against them, perhaps to Bethphage; informing them, that in a certain place, which he described, they would find a she-ass tied, and her colt with her, and ordering them to "loose them and bring them" to him: and if any man objected, as he foresaw the owners would, they were directed to say, "The Lord hath need of them:" "The Lord of all;" and not merely our Lord. The owners might have heard of Jesus under that title: but it undoubtedly implied a high claim of authority over them and theirs. He likewise assured the disciples, that they would find the persons concerned entirely willing to send them away, with the ass and her colt, being fully satisfied with their answer. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Note, Mark 11:1—11, vv. 1—3.)—[f] The other evangelists make mention only of the colt, because our Saviour sat on him only. ... Note also here, a wonderful instance of Christ's prescience in the minutest matters. 1, You shall find a colt; 2, on which no man ever sat; 3, bound, with his mother; 4, in bivio,' ("a place where two ways meet," Mark 11:4;) [g] 5, as you enter into the village; 6, the owners of which shall at first seem unwilling that you shall unbind him; 7, but when they hear "the Lord hath need of him," they will let him go.' Whitby.—In the whole of this transaction our Lord had respect to a prophecy concerning the Messiah, (Note, Zech. 9:9,10, v. 9.) which described him as meek, and coming to Zion as her "King, riding on an ass, even on a colt the foal of an ass." The kings of Israel and Judah were forbidden to multiply horses, or to use them in war; for this would make way for worldly confidences: it was therefore a proper characteristic of Zion's King, to come "riding on an ass," to denote the spiritual nature of his kingdom. Asses were then frequently used to ride on, though not so much as in preceding ages: yet this was an emblem of our Lord's external poverty and humiliation; and an open declaration, that he was Zion's predicted King and Saviour. (Marg. Ref. f—l. Note, Deut. 17:16.) The quotation is a more literal translation of the Hebrew text than the Septuagint is, in which the Greek word for an ass is not used, but more general terms, (ὑποζυγιον, πωλον νεον;) though two different words, both signifying an ass, or asses, or an ass, and a colt the son of asses, are found in the Hebrew. Perhaps they did not choose to state explicitly to the magnificent Grecians, famed for beautiful horses, that Zion's glorious King should come to his royal city riding on an ass's colt.

V. 6, 7. The disciples went, without hesitation, on this service, and found every circumstance accord to what their Lord had foretold; which could not fail to impress their minds with a deep conviction of his divine knowledge and power, and help to prepare them for that trying scene which was about to open. When, therefore, they had brought the ass and the colt to Jesus, they threw their loose upper garments upon them instead of saddles. But he was pleased to be seated on the unbroken colt; and by his miraculous energy to render it tractable and steady, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, which were sufficient to render unruly even an animal that had been accustomed to the road. This seems to have been an emblem of his power, in rendering the hearts of sinners submissive to his will in the midst of the temptations of this world; and notwithstanding their natural pride, obstinacy, and carnal affections.—Thereon, or, on them; that is, on the garments; for he rode on the colt only. (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 11:1—11, v. 7.)

V. 8—11. When our Lord's intentions of entering Jerusalem, in this humble kind of triumph, became known; the multitudes which attended him, (being doubtless increased by continual accessions,) began to spread the way, on which he was to pass, with their garments, and to strew on each side green branches cut from the trees; or to carry palms in their hands, as it was usually done at the feast of tabernacles. Thus they showed their joy, and attempted to honour him, by such methods as were used upon the accession of kings to the throne, or on the triumphal return of victors to their capital cities. It was owing, in great measure, to the miracle of Lazarus's resurrection, which took place not long before, that the people came thus to meet Christ and welcome him to Jerusalem: (Note, John 12:12—19.) and he was pleased to accede to it, both as an avowal of his character, and in order to accelerate his crucifixion, now that "his time was come." The multitudes, on this occasion, acknowledged him as the Messiah, who was come in the name of JEHOVAH, to assume the kingdom over Israel: and with loud acclamations they cried, Hosanna to the Son of David. "Hosanna" signifies "Save, I pray," and may be deemed nearly equivalent to "God save the King." They wished prosperity and blessings on him and on his kingdom, with "peace in heaven, and glory in the highest;" either the peculiar favour and friendship of heaven, to render his kingdom glorious above all other kingdoms; or that God might through him be at peace with Israel, and be glorified with the most exalted praises of men and angels. Some of the multitude might use one expression, and some another; but all meaning the same for substance; namely, to welcome him as the promised Messiah, and to wish peace and prosperity to his kingdom. (23:39.) Part of them were true disciples: numbers might be favourably disposed, and act under an immediate impulse: and many might scarcely advert to the meaning of their own words; only joining with the rest, as it is customary on such occasions. No wonder, therefore, that when his disciples and favourers were intimidated and retired, and persons of another character came to head the multitude, they as loudly cried out, "Crucify him, crucify him." (Note, 27:19—23.) They were, perhaps, likewise disappointed, as to their expectations of a temporal kingdom immediately to be set up: and they might be willing to atone to their rulers for their former offence, by joining them against Jesus. For it gave the latter great umbrage to see the city in such commotion, and every body inquiring who this was, and ready to receive "Jesus of Nazareth, the prophet of Galilee," as their promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. Note, Mark 11:1—11, v. 10.)—Hosanna. (9) Note, Ps. 118:25,26.

V. 12, 13. It appears from St. Mark, that Jesus went to the temple and surveyed it, the same day on which he rode into Jerusalem; yet he relates the expulsion of the traders, as if it had occurred on the next day: hence some conclude that he expelled them on two days in succession; the mercenary dealers returning to their occupation as soon as he was departed. (Mark 11:15.) But this is not probable.—When, however, Zion's King entered his royal city, he did not go to any palace, or senate-house, or court of justice; but to the temple, to show the spiritual nature of his kingdom. There he found some of the precincts, probably the court of the Gentiles, turned into a market for cattle, and such things as were used in their sacrifices: and in part occupied by money-changers, who gave the current coin in exchange for that of other countries, for the sake of a premium; or gave money for bills of exchange or letters of credit, from merchants or bankers in the several countries whence the people came to worship. It may be supposed, that the persons concerned exacted on strangers, and thus joined iniquity to profanation: whilst the priests encouraged these scandalous transactions, doubtless for a share of the booty! Our Lord, therefore, drove the whole company from the place, as he had before done when he entered on his ministry; (Note, John 2:13—17.) a divine energy attending his words and works, which dismayed every mind, and prevented all opposition. And when the peculiar property of the money-changers, and the sellers of doves, caused them to loiter, he overturned their tables and seats, and constrained them to be gone.—At the same time, he reminded them of the words which God had spoken by his prophets concerning his temple, (Notes, Is. 56:3—7, v. 7. Jer. 7:8—11 vv. 10,11.) that it should be rendered a house of prayer and holy worship, not only to the Jews, but to persons of all nations: whereas, instead of allowing the Gentiles a place to worship in, they had converted the court intended for that purpose into a place of merchandise, which was conducted with such fraud and exaction, that it was become a den of thieves; so that dishonest men were sheltered from justice within the precincts of the temple, as robbers are in their caves and forests. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mal. 3:1—4. Mark 11:15—21.)—The quotation from Isaiah, is in the words of the Septuagint; which exactly render the original Hebrew. The words of Jeremiah seem rather referred to than quoted.

V. 14—16. The blind and lame persons who frequented the avenues of the temple, to ask alms of those that entered, came around Jesus on this occasion, and he healed them: thus showing the benign nature of his authority, and producing as it were the seal of heaven to what he had done. But the chief priests and scribes, instead of being convinced by his miracles, were the more exasperated; especially when they heard the very children, who had followed him into the temple, crying out, "Hosanna to the Son of David,' as the multitudes had done before. They therefore, in a cavilling manner, inquired whether he heard what they said. To which he answered in a way which implied that he approved of it, as an honour justly due to him: and he asked them, whether they had never read the words of David, declaring, that "God perfected his praise, even out of the mouths of babes." (Ps. 8:2.) Thus he intimated, that, as the Son of God, he had caused honour to be rendered to him by these children, while the rulers and priests were endeavouring to disgrace him; and that it was a specimen of that glory which he would receive in all ages, from the humble and despised of the human race. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 19:28—40, v. 40.)—The Septuagint is exactly quoted, though it varies from the Hebrew. (Note, Ps. 8:2)—Perfected. (16) Καταρτισω. V. 17—20. It does not appear, that any person in Jerusalem offered to entertain Christ on this occasion: at least, he chose to retire to Bethany, from the rage of his enemies, and the acclamations of the people. Accordingly he spent the night there, probably at the house of Lazarus and his sisters: and in the morning, for the sake of retirement, and that he might be early at the temple, or that he might not disturb the family, he went away fasting. He was therefore hungry by the way; and seeing a single fig-tree covered with leaves, he went to it, as though he expected fruit from it. But when he found that there were only leaves, he pronounced a solemn malediction upon it, saying, "Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever:" and the next morning, the disciples observed with astonishment that the fig-tree was entirely dead, and all its verdure withered. This was an emblem of the Jewish nation, which professed to worship the true God, and seemed to promise fruit; but when Christ came he found none: they therefore fell under his wrath, and their profession and privileges withered; nor have they produced any of the genuine fruits of righteousness from his time to this present day. V. 21, 22. When Jesus observed the surprise of the disciples, he again showed them the energy of faith, with a special reference to the power of working miracles in his name. Whenever a proper occasion offered of performing a miracle in support of their doctrine, and they went about it, relying on his power and not doubting of his concurrence; they would

I say unto you, [x]If ye have faith, and doubt not, ye shall not only do this which is done to the fig-tree, but also if ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, it shall be done.

28 ¶ But [i]what think ye? [k]A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, [l]Son, go work to-day in my vineyard.

29 He answered and said, [m]I will not: but [n]afterward [o]he repented, and went.

30 And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, [o]I go, sir: and went not.

31 Whether of them twain [p]did the will of his father? They say unto him, [q]The first. Jesus saith unto them, [r]Verily I say unto you, That [s]the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you.

32 For John [t]came unto you in the way of righteousness, [u]and ye believed him not; but the publicans and the harlots believed him: and ye, when ye had seen it, [x]repented not afterward, that ye might believe him. [Practical Observations.] not only be enabled to perform as wonderful works as that of withering the barren fig-tree; but even the mount of Olives, which they were then passing, might at their word be removed and cast into the sea: that is, nothing which they undertook would be impossible for them. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, 17:19, 20. Luke 17:5,6.) To this our Lord subjoined, that they ought not to doubt, but verily to believe, that they should receive whatever they asked in prayer. This too specially refers to the case of miracles; but not exclusively. Whenever any person offers suitable petitions, in a right manner, and grounded on God's express promise; he ought not to doubt of his power or willingness to grant them, on account either of his own unworthiness, or of any difficulty in the way. (1 Cor. 13:2.)' Whithy.

V. 23—27. As our Lord now openly appeared in the character of the Messiah; the chief priests, and other leading persons of the nation, were exceedingly offended at his teaching, and working miracles in the temple: and especially as he had exposed those corrupt practices, at which they had connived. They thought themselves the source of ecclesiastical authority, and the rulers of the temple; and therefore they came to him in a body, to demand "by what authority he did these things." For they overlooked the divine power of his miracles, which sanctioned all his other actions. The answer of our Lord is a most beautiful model of "the meekness of wisdom." He did not directly assert his divine prerogative, or appeal to his miracles, or reproach them with perverseness and hypocrisy; though he did the latter, on other occasions, in the character of the heart-searching Judge; but he left them on this occasion to condemn themselves. He only inquired of them, what they thought of John's ministry and baptism; whether these were of divine authority, or merely from man. If they fairly answered this plain question; he would then explicitly inform them by what authority he acted. This inquiry threw them into the greatest embarrassment: they readily perceived the drift of it, and, reasoning among themselves, observed, that if they allowed John to have acted by divine authority, Jesus would certainly inquire of them, "Why did ye not then believe him?" This referred not only to his exhortations to "repentance and fruits meet for repentance;" but also to his testimony to Jesus as the promised Messiah, "the Lamb of God," and the "Son of God;" and this inference they did not know how to evade. On the other hand, if they treated John's baptism as a mere human device, they feared lest the people should stone them, for these were generally persuaded that John was a prophet, and a very eminent servant of God. Being thus pressed on every hand, they were constrained to confess their ignorance or uncertainty; and thus to allow that they were incompetent to determine who was, and who was not, sent by God; that is, that they were "blind guides," who could only mislead those who depended on them. Our Lord, therefore, refused to give them any answer to their inquiry about his authority; concerning which John's testimony, his own character, doctrine, and miracles, and the Scriptures of the prophets, gave abundant information to every impartial person.—' They could not own the baptism of John to be from heaven, but they must also own Christ to be the Son of God, and him concerning whom God had testified by a voice from heaven, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, that he was "the beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased:" whence these great doctors chose rather to pretend ignorance than to confess that truth which would condemn them. Whitby. V. 28—32. The principal persons who professed a zealous regard to religion, and who were the apparent supporters of it, among the Jews, were more inveterate enemies to the truth, than the vilest profligates in the nation. This Jesus showed in a parable.—The father of these two sons represents God, as the Creator and Benefactor of all men, and as the special Friend of Israel. The first of the two sons represented the profligate and openly wicked Jews, who were at length brought to repentance, and became the disciples of Christ: and the second son represented the priests, scribes, and Pharisees, who had "a form of godliness," but proved the greatest enemies to the gospel. Our Lord, therefore, asked their opinion concerning these two sons; "Whether of them twain did the will of his Father?" And when they could not but acknowledge, that the latter was the more obedient of the two: he applied it to the publicans and harlots, whom they despised and despaired of, but who actually entered into the kingdom of God before them. This was evident in the success of John's ministry: for when John came showing, by his doctrine and example, "the way of righteousness;" the chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees did not believe him: while many of the publicans and harlots received his testimony, and as true penitents embraced the gospel: yet when the former had seen the effects of John's ministry, they continued impenitent and unbelieving; they neither changed their judgment and conduct, nor yet believed John's word, to acknowledge the Messiah whom he had pointed out to them.—Some think, that the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the gentiles, were also thus intimated. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 19:29,30, v. 30. Luke 15.)

V. 33—39. Our Lord next added a parable, which related to the nation at large: yet with peculiar reference to their rulers and teachers. The vineyard, the fence, the wine press, and the tower, have been briefly explained, on a similar parable. (Notes, Is. 5:1—7.) The oracles of God, the instituted ordinances, and all the means of instruction, and peculiar privileges, vouchsafed to Israel, were intended. These 34 And when the time of the fruit drew near, [a]he sent his servants to the husbandmen, [b]that they might receive the fruits of it.

35 And the husbandmen [c]took his servants, and beat one, and killed another, and stoned another.

36 Again, he sent other servants more than the first: and they did unto them likewise.

37 But [d]last of all, he sent unto them his son, saying, [e]They will reverence my son.

38 But when the husbandmen saw the son, they said among themselves, [f]This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance.

39 And they [g]caught him, and [k]cast him out of the vineyard, [i]and slew him.

40 When the lord therefore of the vineyard cometh, [m]what will he do unto those husbandmen?

41 They say unto him, [n]He will miserably destroy those wicked men, [o]and will let out his vineyard unto other husbandmen, which shall render him the fruits in their seasons.

42 Jesus saith unto them, [p]Did ye never read in the Scriptures, [q]The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the LORD'S doing, [r]and it is marvellous in our eyes?

43 Therefore say I unto you, [s]the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to [t]a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof.

44 And [u]whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken: [x]but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

45 And when the chief priests and Pharisees had heard his parables, [y]they perceived that he spake of them.

46 But when [z]they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, [a]because they took him for a prophet.

were given them, in order that they might be rendered fruitful in good works; and were especially intrusted to the priests and rulers, for the benefit of the people. But when the Lord was no longer present among them, by external displays of his power and glory, as he had been when the law was promulgated: they forgot their accountableness to him, and acted as if their possessions, and authority, and distinctions, were independently their own, to be employed according to the dictates of their wordly inclinations. They neglected their duty, and were unfaithful to their trust: but from time to time he sent prophets, to call them to repentance, and to direct their attention to the promises of a Messiah who was to come: thus the fruits were demanded in their season. But the rulers and teachers, in every age, had been exasperated by these faithful monitors; and, instead of "repenting and doing works meet for repentance," they apprehended the servants of JEHOVAH, "beating one and killing another;" and when he sent others, they still treated them as criminals and enemies, out of hatred to their Master and their message. Yet at length the Lord saw it proper to send his only and well-beloved Son, supposing that they would "reverence him." In applying the parable, it is not needful to inquire how far such a measure would have been prudent in a householder; for it was doubtless in infinite wisdom, as well as love, that "the Father sent his Son to be the Saviour of the world." On the other hand, he certainly did not expect that the Jews would "reverence him;" for he had for ages before predicted how they would reject, abhor, and persecute him. They, however, ought to have adored him and submitted to him; and their usage of one so excellent and honourable, and manifested to be so by all his miracles, his words and conduct, formed the grand aggravation of their atrocious wickedness. For "when they saw the Son, they said among themselves, Let us kill him, and let us seize on the inheritance." This described the spirit and conduct of the Jewish rulers, who were at the very time consulting together to put Jesus to death, in order to secure their own authority and reputation, and to preserve the nation from the Romans; as if determined wilfully to murder the heir, in order to seize on the inheritance. For these purposes, they apprehended him, cast him out of the vineyard, and put him to death: that is, the priests and rulers apprehended Christ, condemned him, and led him out of Jerusalem to be crucified. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 23:34—36. Mark 12:1—12. Luke 20:9—18, vv. 10—14. Acts 7:51—53. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.)

V. 40—44. Having spoken the parable, Jesus inquired, what "the Lord of the vineyard would do to these husbandmen," when he should come to call them to account for their conduct. To this they answered, as not at first fully understanding his meaning, that he would put them to death in some terrible manner, and let out the vineyard to other husbandmen, who would render him the fruits of it in due season. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Note, Luke 20:9—18, v. 16.) And to bring this concession home to their consciences, he called their attention to a passage in the Psalms, in which it was foretold, that "the Stone which the builders rejected would be made the Head of the corner; that is, the grand ornament, stability, and cement of the whole spiritual temple. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, Ps. 118:19—24, vv. 22, 23.) This was about to be fulfilled, in their rejection of him and in his subsequent exaltation: and they would, in consequence, be excluded from all the blessings of his kingdom, forfeit all their privileges, and be visited with terrible calamities; while the Lord would form another Israel, "a holy nation," by the incorporation of Gentile converts among the believing Jews, who would bring forth the fruits of righteousness to his praise and glory. Whoever, therefore, should stumble and fall on this Cornerstone, in unbelief and disobedience, would be broken and perish: yet the ruin of those, on whom "this Stone should fall," would be still more aggravated; namely, that of such as should be found guilty of crucifying him and persecuting his followers. Some suppose, that the distinction refers to those who opposed him in his state of humiliation, and such as should persist in their enmity after his resurrection and exaltation, and the pouring out of the Holy Ghost on his disciples.—The punishment here mentioned may allude to the method sometimes used in executing criminals, by throwing down large stones upon them to crush them at once. V. 45, 46. The chief priests, scribes, and Pharisees, now fully understood his parables: but they were the more exasperated by them; and determined as soon as they could, to apprehend him, and put him to death, whatever the consequence might be: yet they would not do it openly, lest the multitude should excite a tumult, as the people were generally of opinion that he was at least a prophet of God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 26:3—5.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. We should be ready cheerfully to resign whatever we possess, if the Lord require it: for he has a right to dispose of us and ours, for the purposes of his own glory, as he sees best.—There is nothing so mean in itself, but he knows how to employ it in his service: we should not then despise men of weak abilities, or in obscure stations; and we have no ground for self-complacency, should he be pleased to "have need of us," or to use us as the instruments of his work: nor ought we to wonder, if he at one time employ us, and afterward lay us aside, having no further occasion for us.—As meekness and external poverty distinguished our King, and even marked his triumphal entrance into Jerusalem, how inconsistent must avarice, ambition, and "the pride of life," be with the character of his subjects, and especially of his ministers. Once the divine Redeemer rode, but it was on an ass's colt: at all other times, as far as we can learn, he went on foot to perform his labours of love; or sailed in a fishing-boat: surely then his disciples and ministers should be content to weary themselves in his service, and to be poor for his sake: and they should by no means covet or value such distinctions and indulgences, as are more suitable to the kingdoms of this world, than to that of the meek and lowly Jesus.—His servants must unreservedly obey his orders, however opposite to the opinions and fashions of the world; and in so doing, he will order every circumstance for their good, and give them continual experience of his foreknowledge, truth, and love. He has ever

CHAP. XXII.

Jesus speaks the parable of the marriage-supper, and the wedding-garment, 1—14: answers the Pharisees and Herodians about paying tribute to Cæsar, 15—22; the Sadducees about the resurrection and future state, 23—33; and a lawyer concerning the chief commandment in the law, 34—40: and inquires how the Messiah could be David's Son, and yet his Lord, 41—46.

heart in his hand; and he can, when he pleases, dispose the multitude to favour his cause, and to honour his ministers. But of how little value in general is popular applause! It is the way of the unstable multitude, in every age and nation, to join the cry of the day, whether it be "Hosanna," or "Crucify him:" and even that popularity which sometimes attends the preaching of the gospel, is little to be depended on. Multitudes hear, and seem to approve; yet few in comparison become consistent disciples: the applause conferred is frequently injurious to the preacher; his doctrine serves, in numerous instances, merely to condemn the hearers; and it is well, in this case, if he so "declare the whole counsel of God," as to stand clear of the blood of those that perish. It is, therefore, more desirable to be faithful and useful in an obscure situation, than to aspire to notoriety and popularity. But, though many seem earnestly to cry "Hosanna to the Son of David," who prove as inconstant as the winds or waves; yet surely the peace and prosperity of his kingdom should be the object of our most ardent desires and fervent prayers; and we should both labour ourselves, and encourage all "who come in the name of the Lord," to promote his interest in the world. And if "we have the mind of Christ," we shall rather resort to "the houses of prayer," when we come to populous cities, than to places of diversion, pleasure, or magnificence; or even to the houses of those few, in superior stations, who favour his cause.

V. 12—16. When Zion's King shall come to enlarge his kingdom, he will begin with purging the church from traders and money-changers. Alas! what numbers of these mercenaries frequent and engross the outer courts of the temple! The worship of God, the administration of sacraments, the most sacred functions and engagements, and the cure of souls, are valuable or important in their judgment, only as far as preferment or wealth can be got by them. If Christ should come into many parts of the visible church, how many recesses of iniquity and avarice would he discover and cleanse! And how many things, which are daily practised under the guise of religion, would he show to be more suitable for "a den of robbers," than for "the house of prayer!" (P. O. Rev. 18: 9—19.) Ingenious and interested men may plead in favour of these abuses, and rulers may connive at them: but it will at length appear, that the covetous and ambitious spirit of such ecclesiastics has been one grand cause of the spread of infidelity, one principal hinderance to the progress of the gospel, and one most powerful engine of the devil, for hardening the hearts and murdering the souls of men: so that, in fact, such brokers and traders in the temple have far more to answer for, than other depredators; who only plunder men's property, or kill their bodies, but do little injury to their immortal souls. May the Lord then come, and drive them out of the church; and may he stir up the spirit of such as have influence and authority, to check the progress of these sacrilegious profanations.—It is indeed to be feared, that buying and selling, in every way, are often connected with great dishonesty: yet certainly no merchandising is so iniquitous as that which is conducted within the precincts of the sanctuary.—No wisdom, holiness, beneficence, or kindness to the poor and afflicted, can silence the clamours of interested men against those persons, who endeavour to put a stop to their iniquitous lucre: nor can we wonder at this, when we recollect, that even the miracles and holiness of the Son of God could procure him no exemption; but on the contrary, drew upon him the more desperate enmity. Those who hate his gospel, because it interferes with their interests, reputation, or authority, will be greatly displeased with such as show favour to it: but the Lord has often "perfected his praise" out of the mouths of mere children, in age, abilities, learning, or estate; when chief priests, and learned scribes, and rulers professing Christianity, have contradicted and blasphemed.

V. 17—22. It is best to shun needless altercations with malicious opposers, and to avoid all appearances of ostentation: and the genuine followers of Christ will cheerfully submit to the pinchings of poverty or the cravings of hunger, rather than be deprived of opportunities of usefulness; though their zeal and love will not prevent them from feeling the inconvenience as sensibly as other men.—But let us be peculiarly afraid of the doom denounced on "the barren fig-tree." The leaves of profession may impose on men: but the Lord will shortly come and seek for fruit; and if to the last he finds none, the tree will fall under his curse of everlasting unfruitfulness: and how tremendous the sentence of being left to eternal unbelief and enmity against God! to be eternally contrary to him, and the object of his holy abhorrence and indignation! Such considerations should excite us to more fervent prayer; and lead us to offer all our petitions in an unwavering reliance on the promises of God, and on the merits of our great Advocate; fully expecting that he will grant our requests, in every thing really good for us. In this way no impediments need discourage us: for we may surmount or remove them all, by the power of faith and prayer. Thus we may go on with our Master's work, without regarding the objections of his enemies.—Those who are evidently destitute of faith and grace, will often demand of the Lord's servants by what authority they act. As if men might do mischief in a variety of ways without asking leave of any one, or taking out any license or commission; but might not endeavour to do good without obtaining the permission of the enemies of all goodness! No doubt, order and regularity are in general expedient: but even where the external order of the church was of undoubted divine original; when its regular teachers and rulers degenerated, or evidently neglected their duty; God raised up extraordinary persons to expose their crimes, and to call sinners to repentance, faith, and holiness. It is true that the sanction of miracles is requisite for those who would introduce any new revelation: but it cannot be proved from Scripture, that these credentials are necessary to authorize such as only call on their perishing fellow-sinners "to repent and believe the gospel:" and if God evidently honour men in this work, as instruments in reviving true religion, and promoting the salvation of many souls; who are they that shall deem themselves authorized to call them to account about the supposed irregularity of their useful labours? (Note, Mark 9:38—40.) Indeed there have been characters of this kind, in different ages, of whom it would greatly embarrass objectors to give a decided opinion, whether they were sent by God, or ran without being sent; as either conclusion would involve them in perplexing difficulties. Many more, however, will give the eminent servants of God a good word, especially after their death, than are disposed to believe their doctrine, or obey their call to repentance and faith in Christ, and the obedience of faith.

V. 28—32. The whole human race are like children whom the Lord has brought up; but they have rebelled against him: only some are more plausible and decent in disobedience than others. It however often happens, that the daring rebel is brought to repentance and becomes the servant of God, while the decent formalist is hardened in pride and enmity to the gospel. It was by no means peculiar to the days of Christ, that "publicans and harlots entered the kingdom of heaven, before" proud Pharisees and learned scribes. But it exceedingly aggravates the guilt of such men, when the evident reformation of the vilest transgressors by the "foolishness of preaching," serves only to render them more outrageous in scorn and opposition. In these circumstances, it is peculiarly incumbent on those who "come in the way of righteousness," to exemplify, as well as to explain, the holy tendency of their doctrine.

V. 33—46. We have parable after parable, to show us the rage and enmity of the human heart against the religion of the Saviour. How can we then, if faithful to his cause, expect a favourable reception from a wicked world, or from ungodly professors of Christianity; when the holy prophets, and "the well-beloved Son" of God himself, were thus rejected with contempt, and treated with outrageous cruelty by his professed worshippers? How can we expect to convince or conciliate them, merely with our reasonings and persuasions; when the words of Christ only exasperated those to whom they were addressed, even when they felt the truth of his reproofs, and the energy of his arguments? The awful doom of the hypocritical rulers and unbelieving nation of the Jews, was recorded for our warning. They slew the prophets and "crucified the Lord of glory:" but they were destroyed with most tremendous vengeance; and "the kingdom of God was taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." We now have the vineyard and all its advantages: but do we as a nation render the fruits in due season? Here we must be silent, or answer, No. Yet amidst all our abominations, the monster persecution is chained up by authority: and while this is the case, we still hope for the continuance of our privileges. Numbers, however, "stumble at the word, being disobedient," and thus fall on the Corner-stone and are broken: alas! numbers likewise cause others to stumble by their wicked lives. Some use all their abilities in opposing the gospel and dishonouring Christ, apparently in order to obtain reputation and distinction for themselves: it is to be feared, even many professed builders thus reject the "Head-Stone of the Corner;" and that some are restrained in their opposition by no higher motive than the fear of man. Alas! few consider that we are accountable for all our privileges: and shall be the more deeply condemned on account of them, if not made fruitful. Yet, blessed be God, there is a remnant, and we trust an increasing remnant, of such as adorn the gospel by their holy lives: may we be found among them; may we attend to the voice of those whom the Lord sends to reprove or exhort us, in order to our increasing fruitfulness; may we reverence and obey the beloved Son of God; may he become more and more precious to our souls, as the firm Foundation and tried Corner-stone of the church; may we be willing to be despised and hated for his sake; and may we be faithful and obedient even unto death: and so when he shall come to destroy his enemies, we shall "receive a crown of glory which fadeth not away."

NOTES.—CHAP. XXII. V. 1—10. (Notes, Luke 14: 15—24.) Our Lord, proceeding to show the priests and people the criminality and consequences of their unbelief, stated the case to them in another parable; or in parables, for two are connected together. "The kingdom of heaven" might, in this respect, be compared "to a king, who made a marriage-feast for his son." The preceding parable represented the sufferings of Christ, and the guilt and punishment of those who put him to death: but this shows the motive of his humiliation, and the effects of it to himself, to his people, and to unbelievers and hypocrites. The union of the Son of God with our race, by assuming human nature; the endeared relation into which he receives his redeemed church, and every true member of it; the spiritual honours, riches, and blessings, to which they are advanced by this sacred relation; the comforts which they receive from his condescending and faithful love, and from communion with him; and the reciprocal duties of their relation to him, are all intimated by this metaphor. (Marg. Ref. c.)—The abundant and rich provision which the Lord has made for our perishing souls in the gospel, is represented by a royal feast, made on so important and joyful an occasion, as the marriage of the king's son. (Notes, Prov. 9:1—6. Is. 25:6—8. 55:1—3.) John the Baptist, the apostles, and the seventy disciples, who first announced the arrival of the promised Messiah, were the servants that went to call to the feast those who had been bidden long before, even the Jews who expected the coming of the Messiah, to save and bless them: yet "they would not come" to him when he appeared, being prejudiced against his holy doctrine and lowly character. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, 23:37—39.) The other servants, sent with the second invitation, when "all things were ready," seem to mark out the apostles and preachers of the gospel, after Christ's ascension into heaven; who showed, to the Jews first, the nature of the gospel, and the preparation made for it. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Luke 24:44—49. Acts 1:4—8, v. 8. 13: 42—48. 18:1—6.) But the persons thus favoured, having no value for the king or his son, or desire for the feast, or gratitude for the special honour shown them, treated these urgent and repeated invitations with supercilious contempt; "making light of them," and going to their different employments and interests. And, as the servants may be supposed to have remonstrated with the remnant, on the impropriety and criminality of their conduct, they were enraged, and showed their enmity against the king, by abusing, wounding, or killing them. This represents the final rejection of Christ and the gospel by the Jewish nation: and the contempt and cruelty with which they treated the apostles and other ministers of Christ, with the corrupt motives and extreme wickedness of their conduct. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, 23:34—36. John 11:47—53. 16:1—3. Acts 7:51—60. 12:1—4.) When the king heard this, he resolved to send them no more invitations; but in due time he made war upon them, destroyed "the murderers, and burned up their city." Thus the Lord sent the Roman armies to execute vengeance on the Jewish nation, and to desolate Jerusalem, for their obstinate contempt of his gospel, and the cruelties exercised towards the ministers of Christ, which completed their guilt in crucifying him. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—As, however, the persons first invited would not come, and so proved themselves unworthy of the favour shown them; the king determined to find other guests to partake of his royal banquet: he therefore sent his servants into the public roads, ordering them to invite all whom they met with, of every rank, description, and character. Accordingly they collected together a sufficient number to furnish the wedding with guests. This represented the successful preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, and their admission to all the privileges of the Lord's people. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, 13:36—43,47—50. 21:40—44.)—'Not all the whole company of them that are called by the voice of the gospel, are the true church before God: for the most part of them had rather follow the commodities of this life; and some do most cruelly persecute those that call them. But they are the true church, who obey when they are called; such as for the most part they are whom the world despiseth.'

V. 11—14. The preceding part of the parable represented the replenishing of the church with professed Christians: this shows the difference between nominal and real disciples. According to the custom of those times, when princes had large wardrobes, from which, on some occasions, they furnished numbers with suitable apparel; it must be supposed, that a wedding-garment was offered to each guest when he entered the banqueting-house: for it could not be expected that travellers from the highways should be properly habited for the royal entertainment, to which they were so unexpectedly invited. One man, however, either proud of his own apparel, or despising the feast, obtained admission without the wedding-garment, and continued unnoticed till the king came in to see his guests; when, being questioned how he came thither, "he was speechless:" which he could not have been, if it had been out of his power to procure a wedding-garment. He was therefore ordered to be excluded and punished, as a despiser of the king and the royal banquet, by being thrown, bound hand and foot, into some dark dungeon without the palace; where weeping and extreme vexation would be his portion, while the guests were enjoying the feast.—This denotes that some who have not the true and living "faith which worketh by love," are found among the guests at the gospel feast, and intrude among the people of God in attending on its most sacred ordinances. It is not material, whether we understand the wedding-garment to mean the imputed righteousness of Christ, or "the sanctification of the Spirit;" for both are alike necessary, and they always go together. No man can obtain either of these blessings, except from Christ, and by faith in him; yet those who remain unrighteous and unholy, besides all their other crimes, are chargeable with refusing the blessing when offered them. Such persons often impose on ministers and Christians: but when the King shall come to scrutinize the whole multitude of his guests, he will detect their hypocrisy, silence their excuses, and expose their wickedness. (Marg. Ref. u, z—b. Notes, Is. 61:10,11. Luke 15:22—24. Rom. 3:19,20,21—26, v. 22. 1 Cor. 1:26—31, v. 30. Rev. 19:7,8.)—The appellation of "friend," seems to allude to the man's profession, and contains a tacit reproof of his inconsistent character. (Marg. Ref. y.)—"The outer darkness, &c." plainly describes the future portion of all hypocrites of every nation, as well as open unbelievers. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, 8:10—12.) This parable our Lord closed, as he had done one before, by observing that many were called, or invited by the gospel, who were not chosen and approved as 15 ¶ Then went the Pharisees, and took counsel [s]how they might entangle him in his talk.

16 And they sent out unto him their disciples [h]the Herodians, saying, [i]Master, [k]we know that thou art [l]true, and teachest the way of God in truth, [m]neither carest thou for any man; for thou regardest not the person of men.

17 Tell us therefore, [n]What thinkest thou? [o]Is it lawful to give tribute unto [p]Cæsar, or not?

18 But Jesus [q]perceived their wickedness, and said, [r]Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites?

19 Show me the tribute-money. And they brought unto him [s]a penny.

20 And he saith unto them, Whose is this image and [t]superscription?

21 They say unto him, Cæsar's. Then saith he unto them, [t]Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, [u]and unto God the things that are God's.

22 When they had heard these words, [x]they marvelled, and left him, and went their way.

23 ¶ The [y]same day came to him [z]the Sadducees, [a]which say that there is no resurrection, and asked him, 24 Saying, [b]Master, [c]Moses said, If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

25 Now [d]there were with us seven brethren: and the first, when he had married a wife, deceased, and, having no issue, left his wife unto his brother:

26 Likewise the second also, and the third, unto the [f]seventh.

27 And last of all the woman died also.

28 Therefore in the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? for they all had her.

29 Jesus answered and said unto them, Ye do err, [e]not knowing the Scriptures, [f]nor the power of God.

30 For [g]in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are [h]as the angels of God in heaven.

31 But as touching the resurrection of the dead, [i]have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, 32 I [k]am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? [l]God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

33 And when the multitude heard this, [m]they were astonished at his doctrine.

V. 15—22. This question was proposed to our Lord in consequence of a plan formed by the chief priests and rulers, to compass his death. The persons sent on this occasion were Pharisees and Herodians. They held contrary opinions in the controverted point of paying tribute to the Roman emperor. The Pharisees inferred from the law, which forbade them to place a stranger over them as their king, that it was unlawful to obey or pay tribute to the Romans, though forcibly reduced to subjection under them: and this suited the refractory spirit and the pride of the people, and was the more popular opinion. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, Mark 12:13—17.) But the Herodians, (Marg Ref. h,) who were strongly tinctured with Sadducean infidelity, and avowedly attached to Herod's family, made their religion subservient to their politics, and endeavoured to accommodate it to the humours and interests of their prince: and as he was supported by the Romans, so they argued that tribute might lawfully be paid to them. These contending parties combined to entangle our Lord in his discourse: and, finding that he was open and communicative, they addressed him as "a teacher of righteousness," whose knowledge, faithfulness, and disinterested intrepid impartiality, they highly venerated. After this insidious exordium, (which, though most justly deserved by him, was, in their mouths, most vile flattery,) they desired him to inform them, whether he thought it lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar, or not; for they were disposed to settle that controversy by his judgment. It seems, that they thought it impossible for him so to answer as to escape the snare. Had he simply directed them to pay tribute, they would have represented him, not only as an enemy to their liberties, but also as deciding in opposition to the law of Moses, and requiring unreserved obedience to idolaters. On the other hand, had he declared it unlawful to pay tribute to Cæsar; they would have accused him before the Roman governor, and have delivered him up into Pilate's hands, to be punished for sedition or rebellion. (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes, Luke 20:19—26, v. 20. 23:1—5.) But Jesus gave them to understand, that he was fully aware of their insidious designs: yet he chose to answer the question, because he intended to graft on it most important instruction. Having, therefore, obtained the coin in which the tribute was paid, and drawn them to acknowledge that it was stamped with Cæsar's image and name; he tacitly inferred that Cæsar was the civil ruler to whom God had subjected them: and therefore, as they derived protection, and the benefits of magistracy from him, (of which the currency of his coinage was an evidence,) they were not only allowed, but required, to render to him both tribute, and civil honour and obedience. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q—t. Notes, Jer. 27:4—11. 29:4—7. Rom. 13:6,7.) At the same time, they must render to God that honour, worship, love, and service, which his commandments claimed, and which were justly due to him; and must not disobey him, out of regard to any earthly sovereign. This answer condemned equally the refractory spirit of the Pharisees, who scrupled civil obedience to the Roman emperors under pretence of religion; and the time-serving Herodians, who made a compliment of their religion to their prince, and conformed to many heathen customs to please him: and it is moreover of universal application, and replete with practical instruction. The conviction conveyed by this most wise, conclusive, and beautiful answer to so delicate a question, astonished, confounded, and disappointed the spies, and they went away unable to take any advantage of his words. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Note, Prov. 26:4,5.)—'Christians must obey their magistrates, although they be wicked and extortioners; but so ... that the authority of God may remain safe to him, and his honour be not diminished. Beza. Note, Acts 4:13—22, vv. 19,20.)

They might entangle. (15) Παγιδευσωσιν. Used here only in the New Testament. 1 Sam. 28:9. Sept. It signifies to take in a snare, as fowlers take birds.—Ye hypocrites. (18) Note, 6:1—4, v. 2. 'Christ justly calls these persons hypocrites, because they pretended to own him as a just person, and one who bore no respect to persons; and yet came with design to accuse him for an unjust decision. And ... because they ... (Luke 20:20,) "feigned themselves" to be such as they were not.' Whithy.

V. 23—33. The Sadducees denied a future resurrection, as well as the immortality of the soul: yet they allowed the divine authority of the books of Moses, and of some parts of Scripture. (Marg. Ref. z. Acts 23:8.) They knew, however, that Jesus taught a contrary doctrine; and they purposed to embarrass him with a difficulty, which probably had perplexed others of their opponents: though the case stated would not have been worth recording, had it not shown the cavilling, frivolous spirit of infidelity, and given our Lord an occasion of returning a most instructive answer. The whole difficulty lay in determining, to whom the woman would belong in the future world, as seven brothers had married her, and she had borne no children to any of them: (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, Deut. 25:5—10.) but the inference which they meant to insinuate from it, was no less, than the impossibility of a resurrection. This method of arguing by insinuation, from imagined difficulties against authenticated revelation, or even stubborn facts, forms a species of logic for which infidels, ancient and modern, have shown a peculiar predilection: and indeed it is the best method which can be taken, of perplexing weak minds, and amusing superficial inquirers. Our Lord therefore first declared, that they "greatly erred," because they did not understand the Scriptures; or the power of God, to raise the dead incorruptible, and fitted for a far different life from this 34 ¶ But [n]when the Pharisees had heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence, [o]they were gathered together.

35 Then one of them, which was [p]a lawyer, asked him a question, [q]tempting him, and saying, 36 Master, [r]which is the great commandment in the law?

37 Jesus said unto him, [s]Thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

38 This is the first and great commandment.

39 And the second is like unto it, [t]Thou shalt love thy [u]neighbour as thyself.

40 On [x]these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

41 ¶ While [y]the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them, 42 Saying, [z]What think ye of Christ? whose Son is he? They say unto him, [a]The Son of David.

43 He saith unto them, How then doth David [b]in Spirit call him Lord, saying, 44 The [c]LORD said unto [d]my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, [e]till I make thine enemies thy footstool?

45 If David then call him Lord, [f]how is he his son?

46 And [g]no man was able to answer him a word, [h]neither durst any man from that day forth ask him any more questions.

(Marg. Ref. e, f. Mark 12:18—27, v. 27.) Among other egregious errors the Sadducees took no notice of a state of punishment in the future world; but spake as if those who believed the resurrection thought all men (at least all Jews) to be of one character, and to go to one place.—Our Lord further reminded them, that marriage was intended only for this present world; to replenish the earth, and to repair the ravages that death continually makes among its inhabitants: but that in the future state, as there would be no death, so no marriage; for all the righteous would be made like unto the angels, being "the children of God as well as the children of the resurrection." There the very body will be made spiritual, and all the employments and pleasures will be pure, intellectual, and angelic. (Marg. Ref. a, g, h. Notes, Luke 20:27—38, vv. 34,38. 1 Cor. 15:12—19,35—54.)—Having refuted this cavil, our Lord next proceeded to establish the truth of the doctrine which they opposed, from that part of the Scripture which they professed to believe: he therefore referred them to the words of God to Moses, when he spake to him from the burning bush. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Notes, Ex. 3:6,15.) The patriarchs had been dead a considerable time before this appearance of the LORD to Moses; yet he there declared himself to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: now he is "not the God of the dead," who have sunk into non-existence, "but of the living," who are capable of enjoying his favour. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Luke 20:27—38, v. 38. Heb. 11:13—16, v. 16.) The argument seems at first sight more immediately to prove, that the souls of the patriarchs were, at that time, in existence and felicity, than to evince the resurrection of their bodies: but if we consider, that man is constituted of soul and body, we shall perceive that it proves both. For if JEHOVAH gave himself, by an everlasting covenant, to be the God and Portion of any person; it implied that he would finally render him happy, in body and soul, by bringing him to the complete enjoyment of his presence and favour; and this could not be done unless the body be restored from the grave. The whole reasoning shows, that the doctrine of the resurrection, and the future state, is as certainly contained in the Old Testament, when properly understood, as in the New. The resurrection of the wicked is revealed in other places; but the question proposed led Jesus rather to speak concerning that of the righteous.

V. 34—39. Marg. Ref. Notes, Mark 12:28—34.

Love the LORD, &c. (37) 'We are to love God above all things ... so as to prize him in our judgments above all things, to esteem him more valuable in himself, more beneficial to us, than all things else we can enjoy; according to that saying of the Psalmist, "Thy loving-kindness is much better than is life itself;" (Ps. 63:3.) to esteem him as the only Felicity of our immortal souls; their chief and most desirable Good; the only Being, in whom is perfect rest, entire complacency, and full satisfaction to be found. ... We are to love God above all things .. with a superlative affection. ... Our desires must be more ardently inclined to his favour, and the enjoyment of him; we must long, thirst, and pant more after him; rejoice more in his favour, than in any thing else; be more concerned to retain it, than to secure any worldly blessings, and be more satisfied in it than "in marrow and fatness." ... Hence it follows, that we are to love all other things only in way of relation, and subordination to God. ... Surely, if I love God, so as to love nothing which is contrary to him, or which he forbiddeth me to love, I can do nothing contrary to the love I owe him. If I love him, so as to prize neither friendship, relations, fame, honour, pleasure, riches, life, or any temporal concernments, so as to offend him by preserving them; I do not inordinately love them. ... Moreover, if I prize nothing in comparison with him in my mind, if I cleave to nothing in competition with him in my will, if I desire nothing in comparison with him in my affections; if I pursue nothing but with relation to his glory, and in subordination to his sacred will, how can I be wanting in my duty to him? And if I be not wanting in my duty to him, how can I sin against him?' Whitby.—Did this learned writer really think, that any mere man, during his whole life, ever thus loved God? Or that true Christians, from the time of their becoming such, do thus without failure love God? Or did he suppose, that he himself had always, or for any length of time, thus loved God? If all, who "are willing to justify themselves," would thus explain this first and great commandment; many of them must soon perceive, that "by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified in the sight of God." Yet, I apprehend, even this comment is not fully adequate to the meaning of the spiritual precept. (Notes, Ex. 20:1—11. Deut. 6:5.)—The quotation of this "first and great commandment," varies considerably from the Septuagint in words; but accords in meaning with it; as it does with the original Hebrew. Indeed, as the passage is found but once in the Old Testament, and is referred to repeatedly in the New, with variation in words, but not in meaning, it is most manifest that no quotation was intended.—The Septuagint seems to be a more literal translation of the Hebrew, than any of those found in the New Testament.

Second. (39) Marg. Ref. Note, Lev. 19:18.—'If the worst, the most despiteful, and most disobliging of our enemies must, by the Christian be thus loved, and therefore owned as a neighbour, what man can be excluded from that appellation?' Whitby. (Notes, Luke 10:25—37.)

V. 40.—The law, duly interpreted, required this love of God and man; the prophets enforced the law, and foretold "Christ, as the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth:" and the whole of revelation is intended to bring fallen sinners, by regeneration, repentance, and faith in the Saviour, to love God supremely, and man unfeignedly and fervently on earth, and perfectly for ever in heaven. The whole system of revelation will generally be comprehended, in proportion as these two commandments are understood: perhaps every error in religion arises from inadequate or mistaken views of them; so that the whole may well be said to depend on them. (Marg. Ref. Note, Is. 22:20—25, vv. 23—25.)

V. 41—46. When Christ had baffled the insidious devices of his enemies, and exposed their ignorance, hypocrisy, and malice; he proposed a question to them as they gathered around him. He inquired, what thoughts they had concerning their expected and promised Messiah, and whose Son did they suppose he would be. And, when they answered that he would be "the Son of David;" he asked them, why David, speaking by the Spirit of God, had called the Messiah Lord, or Governor, seeing he was to be his remote descendant. (Note, Ps. 110:1.) If he would be a mere man, who would have no existence till many ages after David's death, with what propriety could his progenitor call him his Lord? For he could not possibly owe him any subjection. If Jesse had lived till David was established in the kingdom, David might, in some good sense, have been called Jesse's lord, though Jesse's son: but could David, with any propriety be called the lord of Boaz, Judah, Abraham, Noah, and Adam, his progenitors? Yet this would be quite as reasonable, as to call the Messiah David's Lord, if he had no existence till a thousand years after David's death. And who, even if existing at that time, could be called David's lord, at the summit of his exaltation, as the Lord's anointed king of Israel, except the Lord of all. The modern Jews, unable to answer this argument, affirm that David did not write Psalm 110: but those to whom Jesus spoke did not attempt such an evasion,

CHAPTER XXIII.

Jesus exhorts the people to regard the scriptural instructions of the scribes and Pharisees; but not to follow their bad examples, and especially not to imitate their ambition, 1—12. He denounces divers woes on them, for their blindness, hypocrisy, and iniquity, 13—33. He predicts the destruction of Jerusalem, and the calamities of the Jews for their atrocious crimes, 34—39.

THEN spake Jesus [a]to the multitude, and to his disciples,

2 Saying, [b]The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses's seat:

3 All therefore [c]whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; [d]for they say, and do not.

4 For [e]they bind heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but or they would not have been silent.—This question, which is equally interesting to modern Socinians, the Pharisees could not answer; and they were so baffled in their endeavours to entangle Jesus, that they never after dared to put another question to him. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) Nor can any man solve the difficulty proposed, in a satisfactory manner, except he allow the Messiah to be truly and properly "the Son of God;" and, equally with the Father, "David's Lord" at the time when his progenitor thus spake of him; and that at the appointed season he assumed our nature into personal union with the Deity, and so became "God manifested in the flesh," and in this sense "the Son of Man," and "the Son of David." To this the Old Testament had given abundant testimony: but the Pharisees, blinded by carnal prejudices, overlooked all that had been said of Immanuel, and of "the mighty God" becoming "a Child born," and expected a mere man and a temporal deliverer, instead of a divine and spiritual Redeemer.—'Our Lord ... always takes it for granted, that the writers of the Old Testament were under such an extraordinary guidance of the Holy Spirit in their writings, as to express themselves with the strictest propriety on all occasions.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mark 12:35—37. Luke 20:41—44.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Our merciful God has not only provided food, but a royal feast, for the perishing souls of his rebellious creatures; and there is "enough and to spare" of every thing, which can conduce to our present comfort and everlasting felicity, in the salvation of his Son Jesus Christ. Let none then think of religion, as of an unpleasant service, to which they are urged; but as a rich and magnificent feast, to which they are invited: and, whilst believers enjoy peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, communion with God, and the lively hope of glory; let them not forget at what a price the feast was prepared. "All things are" now "ready;" the servants are continually employed in inviting guests; and their commission reaches, not only to the utmost limits of the visible church, but "to the highways" of the Gentile world. They are commanded to invite all, "as many as they find, both bad and good," to renew their invitations to such as have repeatedly rejected them; and not to be wearied out by disappointments or ill usage, but to address others, and others still, that "the wedding may be furnished with guests." Yet, after all these invitations, numbers perish in their sins: not because they may not come; nor, properly speaking, because they cannot; but because they "will not." This is the effect of profane contempt of spiritual blessings, inordinate love of worldly objects, carnal dislike to the perfection, law, and government of God, and proud aversion to the humbling salvation of the gospel. From such motives, numbers "make light" of the invitations, and carelessly and ungratefully turn aside to worldly employments, diversions, and studies; perhaps pretending want of leisure, or purposing to come at "a more convenient season." Others are enraged at the warnings and expostulations, with which the servants enforce the invitation; and treat them with insult and reproach; or even murder them if they have it in their power. Thus the gospel of salvation occasions their deeper condemnation, because they hate the light through love of sin: and so God is provoked to give them up to temporal and eternal destruction. Sometimes they, who have been brought up under the gospel, prove the greatest despisers and enemies of it: and the servants, who are sent forth into the highways and hedges, have most success in winning souls to Christ.—No objections will be made to any man, on account of his previous character, who is desirous of admission to this feast: yet no man will actually partake of it, who has not the wending-garment prepared for lost sinners, who does not seek and obtain an interest in the merits of Christ, or who remains a stranger to converting grace. (Notes, Rev. 3:17—19.) Many find admission among believers, and continue with them to the last, who have not this "wedding-garment," and whom the King will at length distinguish and separate from his chosen people: then their present pretences will be shown to be fallacious, and they will have nothing to plead in arrest of judgment, when he shall order them to be "bound hand and foot, and cast into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." As therefore "many are called, and few chosen;" let us "examine ourselves whether we be in the faith," and seek above all things to be approved of by the King himself, when he shall come in to see the guests.

V. 15—22. While we carefully shun the hypocrisy and wickedness of the enemies of Christ, we may learn from their words what a minister of God ought to be. By their allowance, and in their unimpassioned judgment, he should be an upright, faithful man, "teaching the way of God in truth;" able and bold "to declare the whole counsel of God;" and not so caring for man, or fearing him, or respecting the person of any man, as to keep back, alter, or soften any part of his message. Who will deny in words, that this ought to be the character of a minister? Yet how few reduce it to practice! Who expects such unpliant faithfulness and unreserved honesty, towards all ranks and descriptions of men, from the ministers of Christ? Who does not censure that man, as rude, uncourtly, and intruding, who flatters no one, connives at no errors or sins of his patron, his friend, or his prince; and will not disguise his sentiments, to please any party, or for fear of the frown of any man or multitude of men? The nearer any servant of God comes to this character, the more need he will have to pray for "the meekness of wisdom," and to copy the example of his Lord: for many will seek for matter of accusation against him, that they may re-establish their own reputation by ruining his; and if his boldness be not evidently disinterested, benevolent, humble, harmless, and prudent, he will often be entangled in their snares.—Few subjects are more perilous in this respect, than those which are in any degree connected with political contests: for it is difficult to touch on them, without giving advantage to one party or other, or without verging to some extreme. Yet ministers must teach the people their duty, though it should interfere with their own popularity, or incur the displeasure of their rulers: and to this they should confine their interposition. They must insist upon men's rendering tribute, honour, and civil obedience, without reserve, to "the powers that be;" let Pharisees, or men of any creed or name, attempt to render religion the watchword of sedition, or the cloak of their depredations on the public revenue; or indulge their rebellion against the providence of God, by reviling the persons or measures of their rulers: and they must equally insist upon men's "rendering to God the things that are God's," let Herodians say what they will to prove, that kings are authorized to lord it over the consciences of their subjects, and to model the gospel and its ordinances, as may best suit their interest, convenience, or caprice. Nor will it be very difficult to apply this general rule to particular cases, provided the heart be upright: except that it will sometimes expose a man to secular loss or persecution, if he determines to obey Cæsar as far as his duty to God will give him leave, and no farther.—But how broad is the rule of God's commandments! The enlightened soul can never seriously meditate on any one of them, without seeing cause to say, "God be merciful to me, and write this law in my heart, I beseech thee."

V. 23—33. Those who are most proud of their reasoning powers, and most disposed to boast of them, often form the grossest conceptions of spiritual things: they speak of God, as if he were altogether such a one as themselves, and of heaven, with carnal ideas and imaginations: so that they are commonly fighting with shadows, when they start objections to the doctrines of the gospel. If they understood the plain meaning of the Scriptures, or had any proper ideas of the divine power, they must be convinced of the futility of their own arguments; which seldom need any other answer, than a fair statement of the truths which they oppose. Indeed all our errors result from "not knowing the Scriptures, and the power of God;" and this should excite us to redouble our diligence in searching the sacred oracles, and our earnestness in prayer to be led into a right understanding of them. We are continually reminded what a dying world this is. The history of men in general resembles the account here given of one family: death removes one after another, and so terminates all their carnal hopes, joys, cares, sorrows, and connexions. (P. O. Gen. 5:) How wretched then must they be, who have all "their good things" here, and can expect nothing but misery beyond the grave! And how grovelling the soul of an infidel, who can be content, and even hope, to die like a beast, for the sake of living "without God in the world!" Yet even of his forlorn hope, he will most certainly be disappointed.—The whole Scripture "warns us to flee from the wrath to come," and calls us to expect a far better and happier state; and the thoughts of that felicity will be the more welcome to the spiritual man, (however comfortable in his relative connexions,) from the consideration, that there will be "neither marrying nor giving in marriage." For he aspires to a higher state of existence; and emulates the worship, the holiness, and the blessedness of angels; compared with which, the most rational and honourable of earthly comforts are mean and of no estimation. In that happy world, the God of Abraham will be the Portion of all his believing children; and they will, in body and soul, live to him and with him, and have the unalloyed fruition of that "fulness of joy which is at his right hand for evermore."

perplexing each other, and trying to disconcert us, by curious questions and frivolous disputes: let us remember that the love of God with all our heart, and the love of our neighbour as ourselves, though the ministration of condemnation to the sinner, is our perfect rule of obedience; and that "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." It behooves us sinners, therefore, above all things, to inquire seriously, what we think of Christ. What are our views of his person, his priesthood, his atonement, his intercession, his power, truth, and love? Is he altogether glorious in our eyes, and precious to our hearts? Do we trust in him as the incarnate Son of God, and submit to him as the anointed King of Israel? Do we seek him in all his characters and offices? Do we desire that "all his enemies should be put under his feet," without excepting any of our own sinful passions? Do we deem him entitled to all the service and honour which we can possibly render him, and far more? According to a man's practical judgment in these matters, are his state and character; and his conduct will eventually prove this. His judgment of the perfections, law, and government of God, of sin and holiness, of this world and the next, of himself, his life past and present, and of his heart, in short, of every object around him, will be influenced by his view of this subject. The temper of his mind will be humble, meek, patient, compassionate, thankful, spiritual, or the contrary, according to his thoughts of Christ; and his whole conduct will be habitually influenced by it. May Christ then be our Joy, our Confidence, our All: may we daily see more of his glory and preciousness, and experience more of his love; and may we daily be more conformed to his image, and devoted to his service. Then our words and works will confute and shame those who would falsely accuse us, and effectually silence the malicious objections and subtle insinuations of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians, however distinguished.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—4. It is probable, that our Lord continued still at the temple; and addressed himself to the disciples and the multitude in the presence of "the scribes and Pharisees." These were the stated teachers and rulers of the nation: in this respect, "they sat in Moses's seat;" for they explained the law of Moses to the people, and enforced obedience to it. Whatever, therefore, from this source, they inculcated, the people ought to attend to and practise. This limitation must be admitted; otherwise, their traditions and perversions of the law, and even their opposition to Christ, would have been included; for they taught these to the people. But he evidently meant, that whatever they enforced or required, according to the law of Moses, or the writings of the prophets, was to be obeyed. 'Saith Theophylact, 'All that they require from the books of Moses, or the law of God;' which interpretation must be allowed of. Because Christ elsewhere requires his disciples to "beware of the leaven," that is, the doctrine, "of the scribes and Pharisees:" (16:6,12.) and that because "they taught for doctrines the commandments of men," and "by their traditions made void the law of God;" (15:6,9.) and "were blind leaders of the blind." (15:14.)' Whitby. No argument can fairly be formed on this, to prove that men are obliged to follow the instructions, or obey the commands, of any teachers or rulers, further than they consist with the word of God: (Notes, 15:1—14. 16:5—12.) yet on the other hand, the bad character of rulers and teachers should not induce men to disobey their lawful commands, or to reject their scriptural instructions. Corrupt as the doctrine of the scribes was, their works were still worse: and therefore the people were in no respect to imitate them; as they did not even practise their own injunctions. Indeed, by enforcing, under severe penalties, great exactness in ceremonial observances, and in their traditional restrictions and austerities, as well as in moral duties; they "bound up heavy burdens, and laid them on the shoulders" of the people: but they found out methods of dispensing with whatever was uneasy to themselves, or compounding for it: so that they would not put a finger to assist in moving the load, which they had imposed on others. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 11:28—30. Gal. 6:11—14, v. 13.)

V. 5—7. Our Lord further guarded the people against the doctrine and spirit of the scribes and Pharisees, who were ostentatious hypocrites in all their external observances. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 6:1—4. 16—18.)—The Jews understood the words of Moses in a literal sense; (Marg. Ref. g. Note, Deut. 6:7—9.) and therefore used to have scraps of parchment, inscribed with texts out of the law, fastened to their foreheads or wrists: these were called "phylacteries," or preservatives, being superstitiously considered as amulets, to protect them from dangers; and the Pharisees, in ostentation of their extraordinary devotion, wore their phylacteries remarkably broad. For the same reason, they enlarged the fringes, which they were commanded to wear upon their garments. (Marg. Ref. h.) In the same self-exalting spirit, they delighted to intrude into the chief seats, when they went to a feast; or to be placed in a conspicuous situation, as very honourable persons, even when they went to the synagogue, professedly to abase themselves in the worship of God. It was also very pleasing to them, to be addressed with great respect, in the places of public resort, as men of eminent wisdom and piety, under the appellation of Rabbi; a word importing the variety of their learning, and the greatness of their religious knowledge.—'What great holiness they placed in putting on these phylacteries, we may learn from the Targum on Cant. 8:3, which introduceth the Jews speaking thus: 'I am chosen above all people, because I bind my frontals to my head and my left hand; and my parchment is fixed to the right side of my gate or door, so that a third part of it comes up to my bed, that the evil spirits may not hurt me.' Whitby.—'These rolls of parchment were by them prepared with a great multitude of ceremonies; and decrees made by them, of the creatures of whose skins that parchment was to be made, and of the knives with which it was to be cut, and a great deal more. Being made, they fitted and applied them to the foreheads, and to the wrists....The special use of them was in their prayers.' Hammond.

V. 8—10. This instruction seems to have been immediately addressed to the disciples, who were warned to shun all approaches to such ostentation, or desire of human applause, as that which disgraced the scribes. Even the apostles, though the most eminent persons who ever appeared on earth, were commanded not to accept of the title of "Rabbi:" because they had one Master, even Christ himself; and they were all brethren, without any pre-eminence or authority over each other; being all equally dependent on their common Lord, and equally subject to him. This is twice repeated, perhaps to show how prone men are to forget it. And, as the disciples were not to affect lordly authority or worldly honour; they were required not to "call any man their father upon earth." This cannot be supposed to forbid men from expressing respect, affection, and gratitude to those, who have been instrumental to their spiritual good; any more than to interfere with the duties of children to their parents. (Marg. Ref. o. Note, 1 Cor. 4:14—17.) But Christians are forbidden to look up to any man, as "having dominion over their faith," as entitled to implicit credence and submission; or as the head of a sect, whose decisions are stamped with authority over men's consciences: nay, they ought to oppose all claims and pretensions of this kind, by whomsoever advanced, or on whatever grounds. If these rules were proper for the apostles and primitive disciples; they must be still more suitable to the case of all other teachers and Christians: and it is evident, that they were given with a prophetic view to the enormous abuses and fatal effects which have since been witnessed in the Christian church, from the ambition and lust of dominion in some, and the abject subjection of others, to their assumed authority and pretensions to infallibility. The astonishing degree to which these evils have proceeded, especially in the church of Rome, the exorbitant claims, and high sounding titles of ecclesiasties, and servile submission of the people, are well known: but the same leaven still works; and many things are found, among different bodies of Protestant Christians, which by no means comport with these rules, and which do not at all savour of the simplicity and humility of the gospel; or consist with believing and obeying no teacher, church ruler, learned doctor, or head of a sect, in the least matter, further than he evidently declares the truth and will of Christ, our common Teacher and Lord.—It is observable, 10 Neither be ye called masters; for one is your Master, even Christ.

14 Wo unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! [u]for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayer: [x]therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation.

that assuming priests of all religions have been ambitious of being called "father," or of some such name; importing rather what they are conscious they ought to have been, than what they really were. The following citations show to what an exorbitant height the claims of the Rabbies were advanced. —'They declare that the traditions of their fathers were equal to the words of the law, and more to be regarded than the words of the prophets: that a prophet was not to be believed, except he could show a sign or a miracle; but as for these elders or fathers, they were to be believed without them. . . . (Deut. 17:11.) . . . If a thousand prophets, who were equal to Elias and Elisha, bring one interpretation; and a thousand and one wise men, produce one contrary to it, we must incline to the most, and be obliged rather to act according to the sentence of these wise men, than of the thousand prophets.' Whitby.—These were, in some sense, the schoolmasters of the Romish bishops and clergy, who have exceedingly profited by their instructions. (Marg. Ref. I—n, p. Notes, 5:27,28,43—48. 6:9. 15:7—9. Luke 22:24—27. Rom. 2:17—24. 2 Cor. 1:23,24. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.)

Master. (8) Καθηγητης. 10. (Εx κατα et ἡγεομαι, duco.) A Guide of the way.' Not elsewhere used in the New Testament.

V. 11, 12. Our Lord further observed, that, if any one was in reality the greatest, he should show it, by being more active, humble, and condescending than others; and by becoming the willing servant, rather than the domineering lord, of the whole fraternity: for it was the invariable rule of his kingdom, to abase all who should exalt themselves, and to advance all who abased themselves.—'No one sentence of our Lord occurs so often as this.' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 18:1—4. 20:24—28. Mark 10:35—15, v. 43. Luke 14,7—11, v. 11. 18:9—14, v. 14.)

V. 13. Our Lord next addressed the scribes and Pharisees, who stood around him: and, without any reserve, in the character of their heart-searching Judge, he exposed their hypocrisy and wickedness, and denounced sentence against them; as he had before done, in some measure, on another occasion. (Notes, Luke 11:39—52.) He first convicted them "of shutting the kingdom of heaven against men." They assumed, that they were the authorized teachers of the Jews: yet they used all their influence and authority to set the people against Christ, and to keep them from becoming the subjects of his kingdom. (Note, 3:2.) Thus they wickedly destroyed the souls of numbers, to support their own reputation, dominion, and worldly interest: for, being blinded by their carnal lusts and prejudices, they would neither themselves receive him as the Messiah, nor permit those who seemed disposed to it: and by keeping them out of the heavenly kingdom, which was set up among them, they did all in their power to shut them out of the kingdom of future glory and felicity.—'They themselves refused to go in; and obstructed the entrance of others, by saying, "Have any of the scribes or Pharisees believed on him?" (John 7:48.) . . . They cavilling at all that he said; . . . rejecting him, as not of God, because he "kept not the sabbath," (John 9:16.) and accusing him of blasphemy, and of "casting out devils by Beelzebub," (12:24.) and by their vain traditions, . . . putting a bar to the spiritual doctrine of his kingdom thus did they "shut up the kingdom of heaven against men" . . . By excommunicating and maliciously prosecuting them who owned his doctrine, and decreeing that they should be "cast out of the synagogue." (John 9:22.)' Whitby—'Hypocrites can abide none to be better than themselves.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6:1—4, v. 2. 12:22—28. 15:3—6. Luke 11:52. John 7:40—53. 9:19—23.)

V. 14. The scribes and Pharisees, by pretensions to extraordinary devotion, insinuated themselves into the confidence of the people, and perhaps induced many persons, when they died, to leave them in trust for their widows and households, or families. Thus they got the effects into their hands, and, on one pretence or other, defrauded the widows and orphans of their property; as if they had swallowed up the whole at once, after the manner in which some greedy animals devour their food. But, to avoid suspicion and to silence every complaint, they made long formal prayers; which prevented the deluded people from believing any report to their disadvantage. Thus religion was disgraced by being made the covering of enormous oppression; and God was dishonoured, as if he had been a partner in the robbery! They would, therefore, have a more tremendous account to give, and be more terribly punished in another world, than other wicked men; yea, than other oppressors, who had not made a profession of piety the cloak of their iniquity. (Marg. Ref. Note, Jam. 2:8—13, v. 13.

V. 15. The scribes and Pharisees were very zealous and assiduous, in endeavouring to make proselytes to the Jewish religion, and so to their own sect; not from a desire of promoting the glory of God, or the salvation of souls, but in order to strengthen their party, and to advance their reputation. When, therefore, with great pains, as if "compassing sea and land," they had brought any one under their tuition, they worked him up to such a degree of ignorant and furious bigotry, and enmity to Christ and his gospel, that he became fit for the most desperate services, to which they could direct him. So that, instead of being benefited by his supposed conversion, he became a more devoted servant of Satan, and more deeply deserving of divine wrath, than before: and as he might be pushed on to such actions as they themselves declined, he became even "twofold more a child of hell than themselves;" that is, more openly and outrageously mischievous and blasphemous, in opposing the cause of Christ and in persecuting believers. (Marg. Ref. Note, Gal. 6:11—14.) —Proselyte.] Προσηλυτον. A hebraism, as "Sons of Belial," "Children of wrath," &c.

V. 16—22. Our Lord next exposed the ignorance of these teachers, who had by sinister means obtained immense credit and influence, which enabled them to do the greatest mischief. They taught, that men were not bound by an oath, when they "sware by the temple," or "by the altar;" yet were guilty of perjury, if they sware falsely by the gold in the sacred treasury, or by the oblations. This decision led the people to a stupid veneration for the latter, in preference to the former, and served the interests of the priests and scribes: but it exposed their folly and blindness in the most evident manner; for the gold and the sacrifices had no other sanctity, than what they derived from the temple and the altar; which must, therefore, be greater and more honourable, than the oblations on which they conferred a relative sanctity. In fact, these oaths referred to whatever was connected with that which was sworn by: an oath "by the altar" included the gift upon it; and an oath "by the temple," the God whose typical residence it was, as well as the gold that was there consecrated to him: even as when a man "sware by heaven," he "sware by the throne of God and him that sat on it."—Our Lord had before disallowed all such oaths: they are profane in common conversation, and not solemn enough on important occasions: but he here shows, that they imply an appeal to God for the truth of what is thus declared or promised. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 5:33—37. John 9:39—41.)

V. 23, 24. Another instance of the blindness of the Jewish teachers is here adduced. They were very scrupulous in minute externals, but very lax in important matters. They professed to be so tender in their consciences, that they paid tithe even of garden herbs; but they neglected justice, mercy, sincerity, and fidelity, in their conduct towards man; as well as their most important duties to God. These were the most weighty requirements of the moral law, which must be obligatory under every dispensation; and if they had attended to them, it would then have been proper to observe the more minute requirements of the ritual law: (Note, Lev. 27:30—34.) but to be exact in trifles, and devoid of conscience in matters of the highest importance, was egregiously absurd. They "strained at a gnat," or strained a small insect out of their liquor, lest it should choke them; and yet they could on occasion "swallow a camel." We must suppose this to have been a common proverb, denoting that the sins they committed were as much larger than those which they scrupled, as a camel is larger than an insect. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 27:6—10. John 18:28—32.)

V. 25—28. These scribes and Pharisees, who "trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others," and proudly rejected the salvation of Christ, were mere hypocrites. They acted as absurdly as a man would do, who should carefully wash the outside of his cup or dish, and yet leave the inside filthy and nauseous, with the remains of his former excesses. They were careful to maintain a decent exterior, and to practise outward duties, as far as human inspection could reach: but they paid no attention to their imaginations, motives, or affections: so that avarice, pride, and sensuality, reigned with uncontrolled dominion in their hearts; and induced them covertly to grasp at wealth by extortion, and to spend it in inordinate self-indulgence. This proved them blind, and ignorant of God, of his law, of true religion, and of themselves: for common sense might have directed them to begin first with their hearts; and when these had been cleansed from the love of sin, and its gains and pleasures, their external conduct would of course have become clean. Indeed, they only resembled the sepulchres of rich persons, which, being painted and decorated, appeared beautiful to the beholder; yet they contained nothing but dead men's bones, putrid corpses, and such things as were loathsome and polluting. Thus they appeared righteous to their neighbours; but God saw and abhorred their inward and secret wickedness, though varnished over by hypocrisy. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 12:33—37. Jer. 4:3,4,14. Ez. 18:30—32, v. 31. Luke 11:39,40. Jam. 4:4—10.)—The touch of a grave communicated ceremonial uncleanness. (Notes, Num. 19:11. Ez. 39:11—16.) The Jews, therefore, used to whiten them with lime, or other materials of that kind; and some learned men are of opinion, that the word beautiful does not refer to the grave when whitened, but when grown over with grass and flowers. But this does not at all agree with the text; for the Pharisees were like whited sepulchres, and so appeared beautiful, not like those which were grown over with grass: and in those days, as well as in modern times, those who could afford it, adorned and beautified the tombs of their deceased friends. V. 29—33. 'By the just judgment of God, hypocrites, when they most seek to cover their crimes, most expose themselves to disgrace.' Beza.—It is probable, that some allusion was in these verses intended to the preceding comparison. Not only did the principal persons decorate the tombs of their relations, or of distinguished princes and conquerors; but they especially put themselves to expense in repairing and "adorning the sepulchres of the prophets," whom their ancestors had murdered for their faithfulness.—They professed exceedingly to disapprove the conduct of these persecutors; and avowed that had they then lived, they would not have concurred with them. Yet they hated the doctrines and precepts which the prophets taught; and rejected, with determined scorn and enmity, the Messiah whom they predicted; nay, they were even at that time counselling to put him to death! In fact, the dead prophets no longer gave offence to their pride, or interfered with their favourite sins; and it increased their reputation, and aided their hypocrisy to appear as their friends and admirers: but Christ and his disciples greatly offended and exposed them. So that, comparing their profession and conduct together, it was evident, by their own testimony, that they were the genuine offspring of those who slew the prophets. (Marg. Ref. x—b. Notes, 34—36. Luke 11:46—48, v. 48. Acts 7:51—53. 1 Thes. 2:13—16, v. 15.) Let them then lay aside these disguises and openly proceed to commit those crimes which they were meditating, and which would "fill up the measure of their fathers'" iniquity: for they were a most subtle and poisonous race of "serpents, a generation of vipers," the brood of the old serpent: and how could such enemies to God, his truth, and salvation, "escape the damnation of hell," by any of their hypocritical observances or vain pretences?—It is remarkable, that the most severe and awful things contained in Scripture, were spoken by Jesus Christ himself. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 3:7—10. Gen. 3:14,15.)

Garnish. (29) Κοσμειτε, adorn, or beautify.—The damnation of hell. (33) Της κρισεως της γεεννης. The judgment of hell. See on Note, 14.

V. 34—36. 'By your hatred against me and mine, you farther show your likeness to them' (your fathers) 'in dispositions also: so that I foresee, that of those wise men which I send to you, some of them you will persecute, and some you will kill and crucify: and so will so far fill up the measure of their sins, that upon you may justly fall the punishment of all the blood of the prophets and righteous men shed by your fathers, and by you their children in iniquity.' Whitby. (Notes, Ez. 18—2—4, 19,20.)—Our Lord here evidently speaks in his own name, and as acting by his own authority. He was about to send his apostles and evangelists, as "prophets, wise men," and "scribes well instructed unto the kingdom of God," to declare to the Jewish nation his truth and salvation: but he foresaw, that the Jews would put some of them to cruel and ignominious deaths, and treat the others with great indignity and enmity. For they would be left to this infatuated conduct, that they might ripen for the destruction, which the nation had so long deserved; and that the guilt and punishment of all the righteous blood, shed from the murder of Abel, through the different ages of the world, might be laid upon that generation: because they were about to sanction and exceed all the wickedness of this kind which had ever been committed; and they might justly be made an example for it to all future generations of the world. (Marg. Ref. e—k, m. Notes, Gen. 4:3—12. Luke 11:49—51. Heb. 11:4. 12:22—25, v. 24. 1 John 3:11—15.)—

35 That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from [k]the blood of righteous Abel unto the blood of Zecharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar.

36 Verily I say unto you, [m]All these things shall come upon this generation.

37 O [n]Jerusalem, Jerusalem, [o]thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, [p]how often would I have gathered thy children together, [q]even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, [r]and ye would not!

It has been before observed, that there are reasons which may induce us to think that Zechariah the prophet is here meant. (Note, Zech. 1:1.)—But it is objected, that 'this Zecharias could not be one of the minor prophets; he living when the temple was in ruins, and neither altar, nor temple were set up again.' Whithy. Dr. Hammond makes the same objection.—Now the fact is, that the altar was set up immediately after the Jews came from Babylon, (Ezra 3:2.) and the temple was finished in the sixth year of Darius. (Ezra 4:14,15.) No prophecy indeed of Zechariah is expressly dated later than the fourth year of Darius: (Zech. 7:1.) but nothing is said of his death; he delivered many important prophecies, recorded in the latter part of his book, which are not dated; ... he was a young man in the second year of Darius; (Zech. 2:4.) there is great reason to think that he lived many years afterwards; and certainly some of his concluding prophecies were exceedingly calculated to exasperate the hypocritical Jews.—'A second objection against this,' (that Zechariah the son of Jehoiada is meant,) 'is, that he being slain by Joash so long ago, could not fitly be set down as the last of that catalogue whose blood brought down judgment on the Jews; it being all reason, that beginning so high as righteous Abel, the speech should descend much lower than Zechariah; and it is not easy to give a probable answer to ... this.' Hammond.—'All the martyrs from Abel to Zechariah, seems to have been a proverb; and it might naturally arise from observing, that Abel was the first, and Zechariah in Chronicles the last eminently good man, of whose murder the Scripture speaks.' Doddridge. (Note, 2 Chr. 24:19—22.) But here is not the shadow of a proof, that such a proverb was used: and it is worthy of notice, that the Old Testament in general terms speaks of the prophets being murdered; but mentions very few particular instances. In fact, I cannot recollect a single specified instance from Abel to Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada; and but one after him, namely, Urijah, the son of Shemaiah. (Jer. 26:20—23.)—This shows that the silence of the Scripture respecting Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, is no conclusive proof that he was not martyred; and the other Zechariah might more properly be called the first eminently good man, whom the Jews, as distinguished from the kingdom of Israel, murdered, than the last; as we have reason to conclude, that far greater numbers were slain between his time and the Babylonish captivity, than before his days; that is, in Judah. —'When Jeremiah introduceth the Jews speaking thus, "Behold, O Lord, &c." (Lam. 2:20.) 'the Targum introduces the house of judgment answering, Was it fit for you, even in the day of propitiation, to kill a priest and a prophet, as you did Zechariah, the son of Iddo, in the house of the sanctuary of the Lord, because he would have withdrawn you from your evil ways?' Whithy. Whatever the compilers of this Targum meant, it is plain, that a tradition prevailed when it was writ en, that one Zechariah, the son of Iddo, had been thus slain. Now Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, is repeatedly called the son of Iddo; but Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, is never called so. (Ezra 5:1. 6:14. Zech. 1:1,7.)

V. 37—39. 'He speaketh of the outward ministry: and, as he was promised for the saving of this people; so was he also careful for it, even from the time that the promise was made to Abraham.' Beza.—Jerusalem, which had been the holy city, and ought always to have been so, is here characterized as the cruel murderer of God's prophets and messengers. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 4:5—7, v. 5. Is. 1:21—24. Ez. 22:3—5. Zeph. 3:1—4.) After this introduction, our Lord proceeds, with immense tenderness and dignity, to declare the miseries which its inhabitants were bringing on themselves by crucifying him; without taking the least notice of the sufferings, which he himself was so soon to endure. The emblem of "a hen gathering her chickens under her wings" is similar to what is used, with respect of JEHOVAH, in several places of the Old Testament. (Marg. Ref. q. Note. Ruth 2:11,12.) The hen, having hatched her brood with assiduous attention by her genial warmth, continues to foster them under her wings, and calls them to her for that purpose, when she perceives them in any danger. She exposes herself to the storm in order to shelter them: though timid by nature, she becomes heroic, when defending them from birds of prey: and they are comfortable, as well as safe, under her wings. All nature does not afford a more apt emblem of the Saviour's tender love, and faithful care of his redeemed people; but his power is also adequate to the confidence reposed in him. He bore the storm of divine justice against our sins, in order to save us from it; and "he suffered being tempted, that he might succour us when tempted." He calls sinners to take refuge under his tender and compassionate protection; and there he keeps them safe and comfortable, and nourishes them unto eternal life. He had for ages, by his prophets, repeatedly invited the children of Jerusalem, or the Jews, to take shelter under his Almighty wings, before he came to call them by his personal ministry: "but they would not come;" so that their ruin was wholly owing to their obstinate unbelief and rebellion. (Marg. Ref. p.)—Does not this language manifestly show, that he who used it was truly "the LORD God of Israel," who sent his prophets to that people?—Many, indeed, during his personal ministry, came to him for spiritual and eternal salvation; and great numbers afterwards did: but the ruin of the nation was absolutely determined; the temple would soon be levelled with the ground, together with the city; and the Jews would be cast out of the church, and excluded from the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom; till they became willing to submit to him who came to them "in the name of the LORD," and to be thankful for his spiritual kingdom and salvation. No doubt but their present dispersion and unbelief, and their future conversion to Christ, are here predicted. (*Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. It has been too common in every age, for those who fill the highest stations in the visible church, to be strangers and enemies to "the power of godliness;" and to be entirely the reverse of those, to whom they seem to succeed in their sacred functions. We must not, however, think the worse of the truths and ordinances of God on that account; but must "observe and do" whatever they scripturally command and teach. Yet we should guard against their perversions, and not imitate any part of their ungodly conduct: for loose as the principles of such men are, their lives are still worse; and they are far from practising even the scanty measure of duty which they teach. Indeed, if the human inventions and uncommanded austerities, which some of this description enforce with great rigour on men's consciences, be taken into the account; they may be said to "bind up heavy burdens, and grievous to be borne, and to lay them on men's shoulders:" but their negligence and self-indulgence often evidence, that they disdain to "move them with one of their fingers;" except as ambition and vainglory lead them to observe some worthless externals "to be seen of men," and to amuse and dazzle superficial observers, with a splendid superstition; and thus to render appearances of piety subservient to their love of homage, distinction, and authority. How contrary is all this to the humble, unassuming, and self-abasing spirit of Christianity!—He, who is consistently a disciple of Christ, courts privacy for his duties, and delights most to commune with his Father in secret: he steps forth into notoriety with reluctance; and instead of "loving," is pained by "the chief places," either in private houses or in public congregations; as he is disposed to make choice of the lowest place, and "in honour to prefer others to himself."

V. 8—12. Who that looks around him into the visible church, could think that a lowly unassuming spirit was essential to Christianity, and expressly required by its divine Author? Who could suppose, that his disciples were forbidden to be called Rabbi, or Master? to assume or receive high-sounding pompous titles, to usurp dominion over others, or submit to such usurpation? It is evident that there are "many antichrists," and some measure of this spirit prevails perhaps in every religious society. Much remains to be done, in all parts of the church, before Christians will live together as brethren, the children of one common Father, the disciples and subjects of one common Lord and Master, in the equality of genuine humble love and harmony; and before no one aspires to be greatest, in any other way, than by becoming the servant of the whole fraternity for Jesus's sake. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) We have all very much to learn, and to unlearn, before we can be completely qualified to form a part of such a company: while we therefore lament the horrid evils, the spiritual tyranny and abject slavery, the damnable heresies, superstitions, idolatries, persecutions, and bloody con-

CHAPTER XXIV.

Christ foretells the destruction of the temple, 1, 2; and the preceding signs and attendant calamities, intermixing counsels and warnings, 3—28; also the subsequent revolutions and miseries, in figurative language, which may be understood of the end of the world, 29—31. By the parable of a fig-tree, he shows the certainty of the prediction, 32—35. No man knows the day or hour, which shall come suddenly, 36—41. All ought to watch, as vigilant servants who expect their master, 42—51.

AND Jesus went out, [a]and departed from the temple: and his disciples came to him for [b]to show him the buildings of the temple.

2 And Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things? Verily I say unto you, [c]There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down.

3 ¶ And as [d]he sat upon the mount of Olives [e]the disciples came unto him privately, saying, [f]Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be [g]the sign of thy coming, and of [h]the end of the world?

tentions, which have resulted from the spirit of pride and ambition: let us watch against it in our own hearts: let us aspire after no honour, except that of being accepted by our Master; of being useful to our brethren; and known as "the children of our Father which is in heaven." But let us by no means "call any man Father upon earth," or so attach ourselves to any leader or teacher, as to be more properly his disciples than the disciples of Christ; and let us believe and follow no man, any further than he follows our common Lord. This weil consists with the deepest humility; which must never be lost sight of, if we would be truly wise, honourable, or happy. In proportion as men endeavour to exalt themselves into consequence and eminence, the Lord will surely abase them; he will save none who continue proud and ambitious; he seldom employs self-sufficient instruments; he will expose to disgrace even his own servants, if they begin to be aspiring, and desirous of honour from men; but he will exalt to real eminence, usefulness, and felicity, those who are abased as sinners in his sight, and are humbly willing to be despised of men, and to attend to the meanest service of love to his people.

V. 13—25. It gives great offence, yet on some occasions it is absolutely necessary, to expose the hypocrisy, wickedness, and blindness of false teachers; especially when they have acquired extensive influence, and are eminent for learning, reputation, or authority. In such circumstances, they often mislead very great numbers into fatal errors, and harden them in sin. It does not, indeed, become us to speak in that decisive language concerning their characters, or in that authoritative manner of their state and punishment, which he did, "who knew what was in man," and to whom all judgment belongs. But it is common for such men to lay themselves so open, by their egregious absurdities, or enormous crimes, as to make it obvious that they are "blind guides," or subtle deceivers, who are going on the broad road, and leading their disciples in the same destructive course. What discoveries then will Christ make in the great day of account, when he shall strip off the mask from every character, and show every man exactly as he is!—They, who are appointed by office to guide men into the way of salvation, often use all their influence "to shut the kingdom of heaven" against them: hating the gospel themselves, they instil their proud carnal prejudices into others; and they are most observant of those who seem about to enter, that by reasoning, ridicule, calumny, menaces, flatteries, or promises, they may deter them from becoming the real disciples of Christ. Wo be to such deceivers! they are Satan's agents, and share with that old murderer in the guilt of destroying immortal souls.—Many enemies of the gospel, nay, professed believers, are notoriously defective in common honesty: for in various ways, there has always been a race of men, who have used religion as a mask, or pretext, to obtain confidence, and to get money. Long prayers, demure countenances, religious phrases and gestures, have gained them the opportunity of "devouring widows' houses;" or of plundering the public, and practising manifold frauds, impositions, and oppressions; and have for a time screened them from investigation and conviction: but such scandals to all godliness "shall receive the deeper damnation," and be more severely punished than robbers of a less sanctimonious cast.—Hypocrites also find their account, in bestowing much pains to make proselytes to their party; while every one whom they win over, becomes more callous in enmity to true religion than before, and even vies with his tutor in pride and bigotry. It is also observable, that new converts to any superstition, or to any sect, are generally more intolerant and vehement, than such as have been brought up in it: for they aim to evince the sincerity of the change, and to vindicate what they have done, and the importance of the contested points, by an excess of zeal for their new opinions.

V. 26—33. There is no tracing all the absurdities of "blind guides," and hypocritical professors of religion. In general, they indicate a peculiar regard to the gold of the temple and to the oblations: in which their own interest and credit are more concerned, than in the purity of doctrine, and the due administration of sacred ordinances. They often teach men to trifle with oaths, subscriptions, and solemn engagements; and to disregard important duties, in order to attend on comparatively little matters, which distinguish them from other parties. But they must be "blind guides," who on any pretence, by doctrine or example, teach men to neglect "the weightier matters of the law," and dispense with the want of justice, mercy, and truth, that they may draw their attention to disputed sentiments, forms, and external observances; and thus "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." The important matters ought surely first to be attended to, yet the others ought not to be left undone, provided they be agreeable to the word of God.—Too many, who seem to be religious, cleanse only "the outside" by a decent behaviour before men; whilst their hearts are full of covetousness, pride, sensuality, malice, and all uncleanness, their secret actions are infected by these evils, and all their duties corrupted with them. But let us seek to have our "hearts washed from wickedness, that evil thoughts may not lodge within;" and then our outward conduct will become clean also. Otherwise we shall be like painted sepulchres; and God will at length lay us open, and expose the filthiness contained within to the view of the whole world.—We should, however, at the same time, recollect, that religion must be very valuable to be thus worth counterfeiting. A hypocrite could not make so good a mask of the appearance, if the reality were not sterling gold in the secret judgment of men in general. Indeed this appears by the conduct of many wicked men, who hate the living servants of God, yet honour the memories of those who lived in other ages and nations. They are ready to build their sepulchres, or be lavish in their commendation; but not to copy their examples, or to profit by their instructions. Thus, notwithstanding their avowed respect to their memories, and exclamations against their persecutors; they continually testify against themselves, that "they are the children of those who killed the prophets;" and their temper and conduct often evince it to their own consciences: and when the whole shall be made known, the severest language, and most tremendous sentence, of the Judge against them, will appear most just and reasonable; nor will there be any possible way for them of "escaping the damnation of hell."

V. 34—39. What a lamentable proof of human depravity does the history of the church exhibit! What men have ever been hated, persecuted, and murdered, like the prophets and apostles of the Lord? And this has been more frequently perpetrated by professed worshippers of God, than by avowed idolaters: so that the guilt of all "the righteous blood which hath been shed from the days of Abel," will fall rather on the visible church than on the world at large. Jerusalem and her children had a great share of this guilt, and their punishment has been made a signal for a warning to all others. But the Christian church, so called, has far exceeded them, the crucifixion of Christ alone excepted; and ere long that generation will arise, on whom the accumulated guilt will fall, of all the blood shed by antichristian persecutors of every name, and in every age. In the mean time the compassionate Saviour stands ready to receive all who come to him into a state of safety and comfortable rest, as "a hen gathereth her brood under her wings:" and when even despisers and enemies become willing to receive and prize his salvation, and to say, "Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord," they shall see his glory and rejoice in his love. Nothing therefore stands between the chief of sinners and eternal felicity, but their proud, carnal, and unbelieving unwillingness. May we then hear his voice, and take shelter under his almighty protection: thus we may pass safe through the trials of life, and the storms of death: and then in the solemn day of judgment, we shall see him "in the glory of his Father, and all the holy angels," and rejoice in his coming to perfect our redemption, and consummate our felicity.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXIV. V. 1, 2. (Mark 13. Luke 21.) The apostle John does not mention the prophecy contained in this chapter; for it is probable that he wrote his gospel after the destruction of Jerusalem. (Preface to the gospel according to John.)—Our Lord, having finally departed from the temple, and closed his public ministry with the awful reproofs and predictions contained in the close of the preceding chapter, (Marg. Ref. a.) the disciples, perhaps adverting to his discourse, came and pointed out to him the buildings of it, as filled with admiration of them. According to Josephus, these were exceedingly magnificent and beautiful, and constructed with the greatest stability; so that it was extremely improbable they should be entirely destroyed, except in a very long course of time: no one, therefore, who was not conscious of speaking with divine authority, would have ventured to deliver such a prediction as that which follows. (Note, Luke 21:5.) But the Redeemer, with a peculiar dignity, as one conversant with spiritual and heavenly glories, and regardless of exterior splendour, simply assured the disciples, that "not one stone would be left upon another" of all this magnificent and stately pile of buildings.—When Jerusalem was taken, Titus, the Roman general, desired exceedingly to preserve the temple, either from regard to its sanctity, or as a monument of his victory: but the pertinacity of the infatuated Jews, and the fierce revenge of the soldiers, defeated his purpose. The temple was repeatedly set fire to, contrary to his strict orders and menaces; and at last the fire could not be extinguished: and when it had done its utmost, the residue of the structure was demolished and the materials removed, in order to search for the treasure which was buried under its ruins: so that, in the event, the very foundations were subverted, and the ground on which it stood was ploughed up. Thus the prophecy received an exact and literal accomplishment in less than forty years after it was uttered. (Marg. Ref. b, c.—Note, Luke 21:6.)

V. 3. After our Lord had removed with his disciples to the mount of Olives, where the temple was full in view; they privately asked him some questions concerning the events which he had mentioned: but their meaning is not very clear and explicit. Perhaps they had a general idea that he would go from them for a time, before he set up his kingdom; that he would at length come in a very glorious manner, according to several intimations which he had given them; that he would then execute the predicted vengeance on his enemies, destroy the temple, terminate that dispensation, and introduce his own glorious reign as the Messiah. Some expositors suppose this to be the meaning of the phrase translated "the end of the world." (Marg. Ref. h.) But it is difficult to determine what opinions the disciples held at this time concerning that subsequent dispensation: and perhaps they scarcely knew the precise meaning of their own questions; for their views were as yet very obscure and perplexed. Some suppose that they thought the day of judgment and "the end of the world," would be immediately connected with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; and that our Lord did not see good explicitly to undeceive them. Indeed this is not improbable; for the latter part of the chapter is couched in language very applicable to those events; and it is proper for prophecy to be in some measure obscure, till it is accomplished. The general import, however, of their inquiry was, when the events before intimated would take place; and what signs would indicate their approach.—'Being asked by the disciples when those things which he had intimated concerning the desolation of the temple should take place; he set before them the order of the times, first concerning the Jews, till the destruction of Jerusalem; and then concerning men in general, till the end of the world.' Tertullian. (*Marg. V. 4, 5. Our Lord, in replying, first cautioned the disciples to take heed that they were not deceived: for one sign of the predicted events being about to take place, would be, that many persons would pretend to be "the Christ," or Messiah; thus coming in his name, and as it were intruding into his office, and fatally deceiving numbers. History informs us of several such false Messiahs, who made their appearance previously to the destruction of Jerusalem.—'Dositheus ... said he was the Christ foretold by Moses: and Simon Magus ... said he appeared among the Jews as the Son of God.' Whitby.—'In the reign of Nero, when Felix was procurator of Judea, such a number of these impostors made their appearance, that many of them were seized and put to death.' Bp. Porteus. These deceivers, promising the Jews deliverance from the Roman yoke, and temporal dominion, drew after them many followers, and excited great insurrections. This exasperated the Romans: numbers perished miserably, and the siege and destruction of Jerusalem were accelerated by these commotions. At the same time, they took off men's attention from the gospel, and occasioned many to perish by "neglecting so great salvation." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 23—25. Luke 21:7—11, v. 8.)

V. 6—8. This next sign related to the external situation of the Jews and the neighbouring nations, when the predicted time drew nigh. Our Lord warned the disciples not to be troubled by the terrible wars which they witnessed or heard of, so as to leave their stations; supposing that the ruin of the nation would immediately take place. These events must indeed happen, and they would forebode that desolation; but the end of the city and state of the Jews would not yet arrive. Many such wars and bloody contests must take place, both of the Jews against their enemies, and among the surrounding nations; together with famines, pestilences, and earthquakes: yet all these miseries would only resemble the first and slightest pains of a travailing woman, which assuredly presage the approach of more extreme anguish.—An account of the wars, insurrections, tumults, and massacres, which took place in that part of the world, prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, would form the best comment on this passage; together with copious extracts from Josephus and other historians, of several famines and pestilences, which made great havoc in many countries; and of terrible earthquakes, in Crete, in Asia Minor, in Italy, and Judea. The latter is thus described: 'By night there broke out a most dreadful tempest, and violent strong winds, with the most vehement showers, and continued lightnings, horrid thunderings, and prodigious bellowings of the earth: so that it was manifest, that the constitution of the universe was confounded for the destruction of men.' These things can here be no more than hinted at: it suffices to observe, that by the concurrent testimony of ancient historians, and the judgment of modern learned men, the period alluded to was distinguished from all others, which went before and which have followed, by such events as are here predicted. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mark 13:1—8, v. 8. Luke 21:7—11, vv. 8,11.)

Be not troubled. (6) Μη θροεισθε (Α θροος, clamor tumultuentium.) Mark 13:7. 2 Thes. 2:2.—The end.] Το τελος. 13, 14. Mark 13:7. Luke 21:9. 1 Pet. 4:7.

V. 9—14. The persecutions, to which the disciples would themselves be exposed, formed the next sign of the times. (Marg. Ref. s.)—When these should be excited, many professed believers would be stumbled, and apostatize for fear of suffering: and then to ingratiate themselves with the persecutors, they would become traitors, and bitter enemies to the Christians, and concur in apprehending them and exercising cruelties on them. 'Christ here begins to foretell what should happen to the apostles and disciples, and to others, before the destruction of Jerusalem: the troubles and persecutions which should come upon them, both from their enemies, and seeming friends: and what event these persecutions should have on some unsound and temporizing Christians, and what deliverance would be vouchsafed to those who persevered to the end.' Whitby. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 10:16—23. 13:20, 21. Mark 13:9—13.) At the same time, many false prophets would appear among the Christians, as distinct from the false Christs above mentioned, "speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." These would deceive many souls, and bring an additional odium on the cause by their corrupt tenets and practices. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) And, through the prevalence of treachery, injustice, cruelty, and all kinds of wickedness, many who did not openly apostatize would become lukewarm: they would lose their apparent zeal for the cause, and love to their brethren, and become shy of them, and afraid of showing them any favour. (Notes, Rev. 2:2—5, v. 4. 3:14—16.) Yet some would continue steadfast in the midst of these multiplied and varied difficulties; and they would be preserved from all real evil, and be saved for ever. (Marg. Ref. a.)—Notwithstanding all these commotions and scandals, the gospel would soon be preached through the various nations of the Roman empire, and in the different parts of the then known world; for a witness to them, that the Messiah was come, to be "a Light to lighten the Gentiles," and "to be for salvation to the ends of the earth:" and when this should be accomplished, the end of the

[a]ion of desolation, spoken of [b]by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place; [c]whoso readeth, let him understand;) [Practical Observations.]

16 Then [d]let them which be in Judea flee into the mountains:

17 Let him [e]which is on [f]the house-top not come down to take any thing out of his house;

18 Neither let him which is in the field return back to take his clothes.

19 And [g]woe unto them that are with child, and to them that give suck in those days!

20 But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, [h]neither on the sabbath-day.

21 For [i]then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be.

22 And [k]except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but [l]for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened.

23 Then if any man shall say unto you, [m]Lo here is Christ, or there; believe it not.

24 For [n]there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, [o]and shall show great signs and wonders; [p]insomuch that, [q]if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect.

25 Behold [r]I have told you before.

Jewish church and state would come.—'It appears from the most credible records, that the gospel was preached in Idumea, Syria, and Mesopotamia, by Jude; in Egypt, Marmorica, Mauritania, and other parts of Africa, by Mark, Simon, and Jude; in Ethiopia, by Candace's Eunuch and Matthias; in Pontus, Galatia, and the neighbouring parts of Asia, by Peter; in the territories of the seven Asiatic churches, by John; in Parthia, by Matthew; in Scythia, by Philip and Andrew; in the northern and western parts of Asia, by Bartholomew; in Persia, by Simon and Jude; in Media, Carmania, and several eastern parts, by Thomas; through the vast tract from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum, by Paul, as also in Italy, and probably in Spain, Gaul, and Britain; in most of which places Christian churches were planted, in less than thirty years after the death of Christ, which was before the destruction of Jerusalem.' Doddridge.—'The world and Satan furiously raging to no purpose; the gospel shall be every where propagated, and they that constantly believe it shall be saved.... When Jerusalem shall be utterly destroyed, the church, so far from being desolated, shall be extended to the utmost borders of the earth.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. b—d.)

(Mark 16:15. Col. 1:6,23.)

V. 15—18. "An abomination" is the scriptural term for idols and idolatry, and in various ways these tended to desolate the church: but "the abomination of desolation" here signifies, the Roman armies with their idolatrous standards, encamping on the holy ground, which was supposed to extend to some furlongs distance from Jerusalem, on every side. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Luke 21:20.) This approach of the Roman armies to besiege that city was thus pointed out to the Christians, as the signal for them to retire to a place of safety; and they were exhorted to apply their minds, that they might understand what they read. When this token of approaching desolation was seen, they must without delay escape for their lives, by leaving Judea, and taking shelter in the surrounding mountains: and be so earnest in doing this, that if a man were walking on the flat roof of his house, when the signal was observed, he ought not to go into his house to carry away with him any part of his property; but to go down the nearest way, (which generally was on the outside,) and flee for safety: nay, a man, at work in the field, without his upper garment, must not go and fetch it, lest the delay should cost him his life. 'By the special providence of God, after the Romans under Cestius Gallus made their first advance towards Jerusalem, they suddenly withdrew again, in a most unexpected, and indeed impolitic manner; at which Josephus testifies his surprise, since the city might then have easily been taken. By this means, they gave, as it were, a signal to the Christians to retire; which in regard to this admonition they did, some to Pella, and others to mount Libanus, and thereby preserved their lives.' Doddridge.—'These ... admonitions were not lost upon the disciples; for we learn from the best ecclesiastical historians, that, when the Roman armies approached Jerusalem, all the Christians left that devoted city, and fled to Pella, a mountainous country, and to other places beyond Jordan. ... And Josephus also informs us, that when Vespasian was drawing his forces towards Jerusalem, a great multitude fled from Jericho into the mountainous country, for their security.' Bp. Porteus. 'Then the Christians fled to Pella, in Perræa, a mountainous country, and there places under the government of king Agrippa, where they found safety.' Whithy. (*Marg. V. 19, 20. Whatever could prevent or retard the flight of the persons concerned, would increase their peril and calamity. Not only would many pregnant women, and such as gave suck, be prevented from taking proper care of themselves, and of their infants; but mothers during the extremities of the siege would literally kill and eat their own children: so that the blessing of being fruitful, which the Jewish women greatly valued, was turned into the heaviest wo. Our Lord also warned his disciples to pray, that they might not be constrained to flee in the winter, as the inclemency of the weather, the badness of the roads, and the shortness of the days, might retard their course and endanger their lives; nor yet on the sabbath-day, as their own scruples, or the obstructions thrown in their way by the Jews, might have a similar effect.—'The Lord showed mercy to Israel: they should have been carried away to Babylon in the tenth month, when all would have perished by the winter: but God prolongen the time, and they were led away in the summer.' Talmud. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Hos. 9:11—14. Luke 23:26—31. Jam. 5:15,16.)

V. 21, 22. At the predicted season, there would be such tribulations, for extremity, variety, and continuance, as no nation had ever experienced from the beginning of the world, or ever would to the end of it. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, Dan 9:12. 12:1. Luke 21:20—24, v. 22.) 'For indeed all history cannot furnish us with a parallel to the calamities and miseries of the Jews: rapine and murder, famine and pestilence, within fire and sword, and all the terrors of war without. Our Saviour wept at the foresight of these calamities: and it is almost impossible for persons of any humanity to read the relation of them in Josephus without weeping too.' Bp. Newton.—'If the misfortunes of all, from the beginning of the world, were compared with those of the Jews, they would appear much inferior upon the comparison.' Josephus.—'Is not this precisely what our Saviour says, "There shall be great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be?" It is impossible, one would think, even for the most stubborn infidel, not to be struck with the great similarity of the two passages; and not to see, that the prediction of our Lord, and the accomplishment of it as described by the historian, are exact counterparts of each other, and seem almost as if they had been written by the same person. Yet Josephus was not born till after our Saviour was crucified; and he was not a Christian, but a Jew, and certainly never meant to give any testimony to the truth of our religion.' Bp. Porteus.—Eleven hundred thousand Jews are recorded to have perished in this siege; besides the immense numbers who were slain in other parts of the world about the same time. So that except those days of tribulation had been "shortened, no flesh could have been saved:" that is, the whole nation must have been extirpated, had these calamities continued much longer. But, as God intended to bring forth "an elect people" in after ages, of their descendants, he was pleased to shorten those days, and to preserve a remnant of that nation, as a separate people even to this day. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Is. 6:13. 65:8—10.)—Many learned men explain this last clause, of the Jews who had embraced Christianity: but it does not appear, that the continuance of these tribulations, in the smallest degree, tended to exterminate them: indeed it is not known, that any Christians lost their lives by means of them. The Jews therefore, and their descendants, who should in any age of the world embrace Christianity, must be meant by "the elect;" "a remnant according to the election of grace." (Notes, Mark 13:14—23, v. 20.)—Should be shortened. (22) Εκολοβωθησαν. Κολοβοω, mutilo, detrunco. (Α κολοβος, mutilus.) Mark 13:20. 2 Sam. 4:12. Sept.

V. 23—25. When these calamities began to take place, the Jews were full of expectations that the Messiah would speedily appear for their deliverance: and the lower they were reduced, the more readily they listened to every report of this kind: so that many impostors were emboldened to assert their claim to this character, professing to work miracles in support of it. (Note, 4,5.) The artifice of man, and the power of Satan, if permitted, can doubtless produce effects which appear miraculous, though they will not bear to be compared with the incontestable miracles wrought by Christ and his apostles. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Deut. 13:1—5. 2 Thes. 2:8—12, vv. 9,10.) The signs and wonders wrought by these impostors, would, however, have such a semblance of divine power, as to deceive many, and would be sufficient to impose even upon the elect, were that possible. But, by the decision of Christ, this is not possible: "the elect" cannot be fatally and finally deceived; because men and devils cannot defeat the purpose of God, who "hath chosen them unto salvation." Professed Christians in general cannot here be meant by "the elect;" for many of these actually were deceived and apostatized. (Note, 9—14.) "Their election of God," and that grace by which he effected his merciful purposes concerning them, were the security of real Christians; and the same cause would secure from fatal deception those, whom "God had foreknown" and chosen, but who were not yet called to the knowledge of Christ and his salvation. (Notes, Luke 22:31—34, v. 32. John 10:26—31. Rom. 8:28—39. 1 Thes. 1:1—4, vv. 3,4. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—As the means of preservation, to those who regarded his word, "he told them beforehand," what calamities were coming on Jerusalem, and what deceivers would at that time arise. (Marg. Ref. x.)—'The delusions of their signs and wonders shall be so strong, that the world shall be utterly carried away therewith; and, if it were possible that the very elect of God could be miscarried by them, they should also be deceived. Were it not more of the grace and mercy of that powerful God, who sustaineth them, and that infallible decree by which they are ordained to life, than of any power and wisdom of their own; they could not stand against these strong delusions.' Bp. Hall.—'They will be likely to draw many after them, even the most sincere persevering Christians, if it were possible for any deceit to work upon them.' Hammond.—The arguments against this interpretation, which some learned men have used, go on the erroneous suppositions, that all the elect know themselves to be so; that there are other methods of "making our calling and election sure," and possessing "the full assurance of hope unto the end," besides vigilance, and diligence in every duty and means of grace; and that God preserves his elect, without their own willing concurrence, instead of "working in them to will and to do of his good pleasure;" and so exciting them "to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling." (Notes, John 6:36—40. Phil. 2:12,13. 2 Pet. 1:10,11.)—The instances in Scripture, in which this expression, "if it be possible," is used, are not many: but they all imply, that the persons spoken of, at least doubted, whether it would be possible for them to obtain their requests, or accomplish their purposes; though the thing might not be in itself impossible. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)

V. 26—28. The apostles were here cautioned, and instructed to caution the converts to Christianity, to disregard all the reports, which were circulated to this effect; whether they were informed, that the Messiah was in the desert, waiting to be joined by the people, in order to march for the deliverance of Jerusalem; or whether he was said to be in some "secret chamber," among his friends, and about to make his more public appearance.—We find from history that such deceivers actually arose; some collecting followers in the wilderness, and others caballing with their adherents in secret chambers; and that they greatly accelerated and aggravated the ruin of their country.—'Josephus mentions one of these pretenders, who declared to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that God commanded them to go up into some particular part of the temple, ... and there they should receive the signs of deliverance. A multitude of men, women and children, went up accordingly; but instead of deliverance, the place was set on fire by the Romans, and six thousand perished miserably in the flames, or by endeavouring to escape them.' Bp. Porteus.—The Christians, if they had not been forewarned, might have been deceived on another ground; for they expected their Lord to come, not to deliver, but to destroy Jerusalem; they were therefore reminded that his coming, for this purpose, would not be secret, or local; but like the "lightning, which shineth" at once from east to west; for in his righteous Providence, he would with conspicuous and irresistible energy desolate the whole land. The Roman armies entered Judea by the east, and carried their victorious ravages to the west, in a very rapid and tremendous manner.—Our Lord further added, "wheresoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." The Jewish nation, spiritually dead, and about to be given up to destruction, was the carcass which was doomed to be the prey of the Roman armies: these were represented by the most ravenous birds of prey, to denote their force and fury; and perhaps because they had eagles for their standards. The history of those times records the multiplied massacres and devastations of the Jews, in different parts of the world; as if they had attracted the destroying sword of the Romans, wherever they resided, or whithersoever they fled for safety. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Deut. 28:49—57. Job 39:26—30.)

V. 29—31. The language of these verses is suited, and probably was intended, to lead the mind of the reader to the consideration of the end of the world, and the coming of Christ to judgment: yet the clause, "immediately after the tribulation of those days," restricts the primary sense of them, to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the events which were consequent to it. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Is. 13:9,10. 34:3—7. Jer. 4:19—27, vv. 23—25. Joel 2:28—32, vv. 31,32. Acts 2:14—21, vv. 19,20.) The darkening of the sun and moon, the falling of the stars, and the shaking of the powers of the heavens, denote the utter extinction of the light of prosperity and privilege to the Jewish nation; the unhinging of their whole constitution in church and state; the violent subversion of the authority of their princes and priests; the abject miseries to which the people in general, especially their chief persons, would be reduced; and the moral or religious darkness to which they would be consigned. This would be an evident "sign" and demonstration of the Son of man's exaltation to his throne in heaven; whence he would come, in his divine providence, as riding upon "the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory," to destroy "his enemies, who would not have him to reign over them;" at which events "all the tribes of the land" would mourn and lament, whilst they saw the tokens, and felt the weight, of his terrible indignation. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, Dan. 7:13,14. Rev. 1:7.) At the same time, he would send forth his angels, (or messengers, the preachers of the gospel, Marg. Ref. i, k.) as with a great sound of a trumpet, proclaiming the year of Jubilee, "the acceptable year of the Lord." Thus he would "gather his elect" into his church, from every quarter, all over the world. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Is. 65:1—3.)—The remarkable appearances in the heavens which attended these transactions, might be alluded to, and the extensive promulgation of the gospel, about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, was predicted: but the whole passage will have a more literal and far more august accomplishment, at the day of judgment. V. 32—35. Our Lord here answers the former part of the apostle's question, concerning the time when these events would take place. ¶ In general he assured them, that the 37 But [u]as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.

38 For as in the days that were before the flood, [x]they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark;

39 And [y]knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.

40 Then shall two be in the field; [z]the one shall be taken, and the other left.

41 Two women shall be [a]grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left.

42 [b]Watch therefore: [c]for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come.

43 But know this, that if the [d]good man of the house [e]had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and [f]would not have suffered his house to be broken up.

44 Therefore [g]be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh.

45 Who then [h]is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household, [i]to give them meat in due season?

46 [k]Blessed is that servant whom his Lord when he cometh, shall find so doing.

47 Verily I say unto you, [l]That he shall make him ruler over all his goods.

48 But and [m]if that evil servant shall [n]say in his heart, [o]My Lord delayeth his coming;

49 And shall begin [p]to smite his fellow-servants, [q]and to eat and drink with the drunken;

50 The Lord of that servant shall [r]come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of;

51 And shall [s]cut him asunder, [s]and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: [t]there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

approach of them would be as certainly determined by the signs which he had mentioned, as the approach of summer was by the budding, and the tender branch, of the fig-tree; and that they would all be accomplished, before that generation had passed away. This absolutely restricts our primary interpretation of the prophecy to the destruction of Jerusalem, which took place within forty years. To this he added, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." The performance and effects of his words would be found more stable and durable, than the visible creation; which would at length wax old, and vanish away; but not a tittle of his word would fail of its accomplishment, and the effects of it will subsist to all eternity. This is as applicable to all other words of Christ, without any exception, as to this prediction, and to every part of the word of God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. 102:25—28. Is. 51:4—6. 55:10,11. Matt. 5: 17,18. Heb. 1:10—12. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 20:11—15.)—'He that shall compare the words of our Saviour with those of Josephus, concerning the wars of the Jews, cannot but admire the wisdom of Christ, and own his predictions to have been divine.' Eusebius.—It is indisputable, that the three gospels in which the substance of this prophecy is given, were extant and widely dispersed, a considerable time before the siege of Jerusalem was begun; and that the Christians, believing the words of their Lord, left Judea and were preserved. Probably none of these three evangelists, (and perhaps none of the apostles, except John,) lived to witness the fulfilment of this astonishing prediction; and some particulars, not here explicitly mentioned, have been fulfilling to this present day. (Note, Luke 21:20—24, v. 24.)

It is nigh, &c. (33) 'I now think it more agreeable to this phrase in Scripture, to understand οὗτος ille. "He," the Son of man mentioned verse 30, stands at the doors. . . . Jam. 5:8,9.)' Whitby.

V. 36—41. Some expositors explain these words exclusively of the day of judgment, as being emphatically "that day;" and the context denotes that Christ intended to lead the thoughts of the hearers, and of those who should ever read this prediction, to that solemn occasion: (Notes, 42—51. 25:) but might not this be done, with reference also to the precise day and hour of Jerusalem's destruction. Even this was not declared either to man or angel, so far as we can learn: but the disciples were warned to expect and be ready for its approach, and to mark the signs which had been given them. (Note, Mark 13:32.) For it would resemble the deluge, in that it was expressly predicted, and some general intimations were given concerning the appointed season when it would take place, with instructions how to escape. Yet men in general would not believe, or take warning: but, being occupied about the employments and satisfactions of life, they would be overwhelmed and destroyed by its unexpected coming; just as the inhabitants of the old world had been by the flood. Even when two persons were in the same place, or about the same business, one of them would be destroyed, and the other escape: as one would be watching and observing "the signs of the times;" and the other carelessly neglecting them.—This is more emphatically applicable to the day of judgment, or the time of death, which is to every one in effect the same thing.—The antediluvians "knew not;" because they would not believe or regard the testimony of God by Noah, that the flood was coming. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. 7:10—23. Ex. 9:20,21. Luke 17:24—37. Heb. 11:7. 1 Pet. 3:19—22.)

V. 42—44. Our Lord, at length, more clearly speaks of his coming to take men away by death, and of his second advent to judge the world. (Marg. Ref. b, c.)—The disciples were exhorted to watch, and be on their guard, expecting and preparing for his coming, as they would not know when it would take place. A man, who knew beforehand at what hour a robber would attempt to break into his house, would be found watching and ready to oppose his entrance: but if he knew that the robber would come, and did not know at what hour, it would be his wisdom to watch all night, and no prudent man would go to sleep in such circumstances. Thus it behooved the disciples to watch and be ready at all times, assured, that in every sense the "coming of Christ" would be at a season, and in a manner, not generally expected; and that none could have any well-grounded confidence of being "found of him in peace," who did not habitually watch, and continue patiently in the obedience of faith, hope, and love. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, 45—51. 25:1—13. Mark 13:33—37. Luke 12:35—46, vv. 35—40. 21:34—36. 1 Thes. 5:1—3. 1 Pet. 4:7. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 3:1—3, v. 3. 16:12—16, v. 15.)

V. 45—51. This exhortation applies to all the professed servants of Christ; but to ministers especially, who are watchmen by office, as well as "stewards of the mysteries of God." "Who then is that faithful and prudent steward," that is constituted over the household of faith, to dispense to each individual his portion in due season; warning, instructing, encouraging, or reproving, according to every man's character, wants, and conduct, by the rule of the word of God, for the honour of his name, and from disinterested love to souls? The servant, who shall be found diligently and humbly employed in this work, when his Lord shall come, will be most happy; for he will be highly honoured and advanced in his glorious kingdom. But if a man, professing to be the servant of Christ, be an unbeliever, actuated by avarice, ambition, or sensuality; if he suppose that his Lord will never come to call him to an account, or that he shall have time enough to get ready before he comes; and shall thus be emboldened to domineer and tyrannize over his fellow-servants, as a rapacious oppressor, or cruel persecutor; or shall indulge in luxury and excess: "the Lord of that servant" will come to take vengeance on him, when he least expects it; by some tremendous judgment he will cut him off, separating his body and soul; and he will, after death, appoint him his portion with hypocrites, to whom belongeth "greater damnation," and there he will for ever weep and gnash his teeth in anguish and despair.—Whatever reference might here be intended to the case of apostates and heretics, in the primitive times; luxurious, sensual, domineering, and unprincipled ministers of Christianity are, doubtless, immediately intended.—'Mohammed ... mentions seven caverns in hell, the deepest and most wretched of which is to be inhabited by hypocrites. Doddridge. (*Marg. CHAPTER XXV.

The parable of the wise and foolish virgins, 1—13. That of the talents committed to servants of different characters, 14—30; and a most solemn representation of the day of judgment, and of its infinitely important proceedings and consequences, 31—45.

[a]THEN shall [b]the kingdom of heaven be likened unto [c]ten virgins, [d]which took their lamps, and [e]went forth to meet [f]the Bridegroom.

2 And [g]five of them were wise, and five were foolish.

3 They that were [h]foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them:

4 But the wise took [i]oil in their vessels with their lamps.

5 While [k]the Bridegroom tarried, [l]they all slumbered and slept.

or in the worship of God. If we continually meditate on the revealed glories of his perfections and works; created beauty will feebly affect our minds, except as it leads our thoughts to the uncreated Source of beauty and excellency.—The true temple is built upon "a living Foundation," and consists of "living stones;" and it therefore shall for ever endure "an habitation of God through the Spirit:" but, all other edifices, sacred or profane, will soon be thrown down, and "not one stone of them be left upon another."—We ought to apply to our great Teacher for instruction, in every matter which perplexes us; but it is more important for us, to be put upon our guard against fatal deceptions; than to be informed of the exact time when prophecies shall be fulfilled, when the world shall end, or when Christ shall come to judgment.—Even true Christians are liable to be drawn into mistakes, injurious to themselves and others, and dishonourable to their profession, by those who come in the name of Christ, and profess to declare the will of God; when they draw men off from attending to his word, and delude multitudes to their destruction.—While we meditate on the extraordinary prophecy in this chapter, with deep conviction of the truth of our divine religion; let us apply it to our edification, by considering the events predicted as typical of far more important transactions.—In the prospect of the approaching season of final retribution, we must grieve, if we be indeed real Christians, to see such innumerable multitudes deceived into a presumptuous hope and fallacious peace. Wars, insurrections, famines, pestilences, earthquakes, which desolate nations, will also excite our sympathizing concern; yet we should not be too much discomposed at hearing of them; for the Lord is thus carrying on his grand designs, in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy. (Notes, John 14:1,27,28, v 27.) It is a vain superstition to conclude from such events, that the end of the world is at hand; for they have occurred, again and again, in different ages, to answer some wise and righteous purposes: but we are not competent to know the designs of God, in his mysterious dispensations.—To ungodly men, the most tremendous temporal calamities are but "the beginnings of sorrows:" and the prevalence of impiety is, in fact, a far more awful dispensation than any other judgment.

V. 9—15. In this evil world, believers must experience, as well as witness, afflictions; not only in common with other men, but many which are peculiar to themselves. If we escape bloody persecution, we must expect to be treated with contempt, loaded with reproach, and hated by the wicked of every description. This sharp trial is often increased, by our being called to weep over such as are fallen, and to tremble for ourselves lest we also should be offended.—Apostates often prove the most treacherous and rancorous enemies of those, with whom they formerly associated: for the evil spirit, which was gone out, has returned with "seven others more wicked than himself; and the last state of these men must be worse than the first." (Notes, 12:43—45. 2 Pet. 2:20—22.) These things loudly call upon us to pray for ourselves and our brethren; and to dread the least beginning of negligence, in attending on the great concerns of our souls.—But besides the greedy wolves, which are sometimes let loose to waste the flock; men also "arise from among ourselves speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them;" whose pernicious tenets and unholy lives bring still greater scandal on the cause of Christ. (Note, Acts 20:29—31.) When iniquity thus abounds, "the love of many," nay, of most professors of the gospel, is apt to wax cold; they grow lukewarm and selfish, devoid of heavenly zeal or brotherly affection; and only warm in the fierce disputes and controversies, which they agitate with each other, instead of uniting against their common enemies. Yet, in the midst of all these evils, there is a remnant, who endure every trial, as gold abides the fire; these, and these only, continue unto the end, and are saved, being "kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation."—Notwithstanding all the efforts of earth and hell, and all the evils which are found within the church; the gospel must be preached in all the world, and with the most glorious success through all nations, before "the end come:" and let us endeavour so to understand the prophecies, which relate to these events, that we may know the duties incumbent on us, according "to the signs of the times," in which we live.—While we remember that the abominations of idolatry, within the Christian church, are sure indications either of approaching desolations, or of spiritual judgments still more to be dreaded; let us learn to separate from the corrupters, and shun all approaches to these corruptions of our holy faith.

V. 16—28. If the danger of temporal calamities renders it reasonable for men to leave all and flee for their lives, how proper is it for us to forsake all, "that we may win Christ," and be "delivered from the wrath to come!" He that believes will take warning, and without delay "flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before him;" but the unbeliever, having been often warned in vain, will at length perish without remedy. (Note, Prov. 29:1.)—If a man would rather save his life, without money or clothes, than be slain in going back to fetch them; "what is he profited, who gains the whole world, and loses his own soul?" (Note, 16:24—28, v. 26.) We should then avoid even those lawful things, which have an evident or a probable tendency to prevent our eternal good: and we ought to pray earnestly to the great Disposer of all events, 'to keep us from all things hurtful to our salvation, and to give us all things that are profitable to the same.' —The greatest tribulation, which ever was or ever shall be witnessed upon earth, befell those who "crucified the Lord of glory," and persisted in rejecting his gospel. "How then shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation," as is set before us in his word! The future punishment of unbelievers will doubtless be so dire a tribulation, that all the complicated miseries which have been known on earth, cannot give us an adequate idea of it: nor will the days of that only evil be shortened; as none of the elect will be exposed to it, that for their sake it should be mitigated or terminated. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure:" then we may know that no enemy or deceiver shall ever prevail against us: and "let us abide in Christ and seek to have his words abide in us;" that we may be aware of the various methods, which Satan and his instruments will take to impose upon us. If we remember what he "has told us before," we shall not listen to those deceivers, who, having new modelled the gospel, cry out, "Lo, here is Christ! or, lo, he is there!" when in fact he is to be found only in his word and ordinances, and on his "throne of grace." Such persons, as deal in imposition or pretended miracles, love to perform their exploits in unfrequented deserts, or in secret chambers; for their ambiguous performances shrink from investigation, which real miracles have ever challenged. This suffices to convince the judicious Christian, that he ought to disregard them. In whatever way Christ comes, light, not darkness, is his garment: his operations are conspicuous and illustrious: the establishment of his kingdom will illuminate the earth from east to west, and from pole to pole; and wherever the obstinate enemies of his cause are found, there will the executioners of his vengeance be gathered together, with speed and rapacity like the eagle's.

V. 29—35. Ere long the expected end shall come: then the "sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, the stars shall fall from heaven," and nature shall seem to expire in convulsions. The tokens of the Saviour's coming will be perceived: he will come with divine power and glory in the clouds of heaven, and "all the tribes of the earth shall mourn because of him," whom now they despise and disobey. But before he executes his righteous vengeance on his enemies; he will employ his holy "angels to gather his elect" from every part of the earth, as with the sound of a mighty trumpet, that they may "be for ever with the Lord." It is not for us "to know the times and seasons" of this grand event: but we may easily perceive the tokens of our own approaching dissolution. Within the space of thirty or forty years, or probably in a far shorter time, the writer and most of the readers, of these observations, will have done with all things here below, and be fixed in an eternal and unchangeable state. Let this thought induce us to attend more diligently to the words of Christ: and, whilst we meditate on his declarations concerning "the things which accompany salvation," on his promises, his denunciations, and his discoveries of the final event, respecting the righteous and the wicked; let us still recollect, that "heaven and earth shall pass away, but his word shall not pass away."

V. 36—51. After all the warnings and instructions of heavenly wisdom, men in general copy the example of the unbelievers in the days of Noah: they "eat and drink, plant and build, marry and are given in marriage;" and act in every respect, as if this world were all, or as if they were to live here for ever. Thus death and judgment come upon them unawares, and with as terrible a surprise, as the deluge came upon the inhabitants of the old world: and then, too late, they wish to be with the believer in his derided ark. Even from the same families and religious societies, death is continually

6 And [m]at midnight there was [n]a cry made, [o]Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; [p]go ye out to meet him.

7 Then [q]all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

8 And the foolish said unto the wise, [r]Give us of your oil; [s]for our lamps are [t]gone out.

9 But the wise answered, saying, Not so; [t]lest there be not enough for us and you: [u]but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

10 And while they went to buy, [x]the Bridegroom came; and [y]they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; [z]and the door was shut.

11 Afterward came also the other virgins, [a]saying, Lord, Lord, open to us.

12 But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, [b]I know you not.

13 [c]Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour, wherein the Son of man cometh.

14 ¶ For the kingdom of heaven is [d]as a man travelling into a far country, who called his own servants, [e]and delivered unto them his goods.

15 And unto one he gave five [f]talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.

16 Then he that had received the five talents [g]went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents.

17 And likewise he that had received two, [h]he also gained other two.

18 But he that had received one, went and digged in the earth, [i]and hid his lord's money.

taking one to heaven, and another to hell. Men labour and live together, nay, they associate in the same acts of worship: yet they are the subjects of two opposite kingdoms; and at death they are removed to the capital, so to speak, of that kingdom to which they belong. As we therefore know that our Lord will speedily come to take us hence, but cannot know when, or how soon; "let us watch and be sober." To us, at least, "the end of all things is at hand:" and as we should be overwhelmed with confusion, if found, at that solemn season, indulging sloth, or sinful passions, or in the places of fashionable dissipation, and should rather wish to be found in the path of duty, or pouring out our hearts in prayer; so let us never venture on the former, or neglect the latter. "We are not in darkness, that that day should overtake us as a thief;" therefore, let us as "the children of light," be always expecting the coming of our Lord. (Note, 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) —Above all, the stewards of the Lord's household should continually be looking to him, to make them wise, faithful, and assiduous in their work; and to enable them to avoid all interested or ambitious pursuits, and worldly pleasures; nay, even all literary avocations, or engagements, not intimately connected with the grand object, that they may wholly give up themselves to their most important work. Blessed will that servant be, however neglected or despised in this vain world, "whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing;" for he will delight to honour that servant, whose pleasure it was to do his Master's work, and seek his glory. But woe be to the presumptuous infidel, the mercenary hireling, the lordly oppressor, or the voluptuous sensualist, in the garb of a priest! The Lord of that evil "servant will come in a day, when he looketh not for him;" and what will all his preferments, distinctions, and enjoyments do for him, when God shall cut him off, and appoint him "his portion with the hypocrites, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth?"

NOTES.—Chap. XXV. V. 1—4. This chapter continues our Lord's discourse to his disciples: and the whole of it relates to the general concerns of death and judgment; rather than to the particular events which were coming on the Jewish nation. Towards the close of the foregoing chapter, our Lord made a gradual transition, from the latter to the former of these subjects; and he here more directly enforces the need of constant vigilance, which he connects with the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, by the introductory word "Then." In this respect, "the kingdom of heaven shall be likened to ten virgins, &c." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 3:2.) The circumstances of the parable were taken from the customs of the Jews, in celebrating nuptials. The bridegroom used to go in the evening to fetch home his bride, by the light of lamps: these were carried by bridemaids, which some say were never fewer than ten; and when they arrived at his house, there was a feast prepared for them and the company. —Christ is the Bridegroom of the church: they who profess his gospel are as the companions of his bride, who wait for his coming: and their continuance in this world constitutes the time of their waiting. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, Ps. 45:13—15. Cant. 1:5,6. 8:13,14. John 3:27—36, v. 29. 2 Cor. 11:1—6, vv. 2,3. Rev. 19:7,8. 21:1—4, v. 2. 9—21, v. 9.) It must not, however, be supposed, that all nominal Christians are intended. Those who make a credible profession of the gospel, and act in such a manner as to give real Christians a favourable opinion of them, and so gain admittance into their society, are exclusively meant.—Of the ten here mentioned, "five were wise, and five were foolish." The foolish had lamps, but "no oil in their vessels," with which to replenish them: that is, they had just as much religion as was necessary in order to make a plausible appearance; but their hearts were not truly sanctified, and stored with holy affections, by the new creating Spirit of God. They began wrong, as well as were left without at last. But the wise had "oil in their vessels," as well as the external lamp of profession. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, 5—9. 7:21—27. 13: 18—23. 22:10—14.)

V. 5—9. The delay of the Bridegroom represents the intermediate space, between the real or supposed conversion of professed believers, and the coming of Christ: their slumbering and sleeping intimates the comparative unwatchfulness and inattention, even of many real Christians, as well as of hypocrites, when thoughts of death and judgment are excluded for a season: and it shows that the difference between the two characters in many instances consists more in the state of their hearts, than in their external conduct. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 24:45—51, vv. 48,49. 26:40—46. Heb. 4:1,2 2 Pet. 3:1—4. 14—16, v. 14.) The coming of the Bridegroom "at midnight," with a loud summons to the virgins to meet him, represents the unexpected manner, in which Christ calls men out of the world, and in which he will come to judgment; and the surprise thus occasioned to hypocrites. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Notes, Is. 33:14. Mark 13:33—37. Luke 21:34—36. 1 Thes. 5:1—11.) The conduct of the virgins, when they heard this summons, denotes the earnest inquiries into the state of their souls, and the endeavours to get all ready, to which the apprehensions of immediate death or judgment excite professors of the gospel. This at length discovered the difference between the wise and foolish virgins. The latter, when they came to trim their lamps, found that they were going out; nor had they any oil with which to feed them. Thus the hypocrite's religion serves him to make a show with, whilst he lives; but when he comes to die, and most wants its support and benefit, it goes out, and leaves him to darkness and despair. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, 3:7—9. Luke 16:24—26. Gal. 6:1—5, vv. 4,5.) But the wise virgins, when they came to trim their lamps, had oil ready with which to replenish them: thus true Christians, notwithstanding comparative inattention, are habitually ready for all events.—The application of the foolish virgins to the wise, for some of their oil, shows that numbers are at last convinced of their ruinous mistake, and earnestly apply to ministers or believers, for their prayers and assistance, in their dire extremity: or it might prophetically expose the vanity of the popish doctrine, concerning works of supererogation, human merits, and priestly absolutions. The answer of the wise virgins implies, that the best Christians know they have nothing to spare, and can give others no effectual help. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Ps. 49:6—9.)—Tarried. (5) Χρονιζοντος. See on 24:48.—Slumbered.] Ενυσταξαν. V. 10—13. This conclusion of the parable shows the wisdom, and happy effects, of being ready; and the folly and misery of an unprepared state, and of carnal and presumptuous procrastination. The wise virgins, being ready, were admitted to the marriage-feast: but the door was immediately shut; and the others, coming afterwards, were denied admission, and disowned by the Bridegroom, as persons with whom he had no acquaintance. Our Lord then made the same application of it, which he had before done of the subject in the former chapter. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 7:21—23. 8:10—12. 24:42—44. Gen. 7:16. Luke 13:22—30, vv. 25—27.)

V. 14—18. "The kingdom of heaven," in this respect, might likewise be represented by a man, about to take a journey into a distant country, and entrusting his servants

19 After [a] a long time the lord of those servants cometh, and [b]reckoneth with them.

20 And so he that had received five talents came, and brought other five talents, saying, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me five talents: [m]behold, I have gained besides them five talents more.

21 His lord said unto him, [n]Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, [o]I will make thee ruler over many things: [p]enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

22 He also that had received two talents came, and said, Lord, thou deliveredst unto me two talents: behold, [q]I have gained two other talents besides them.

23 His lord said unto him, [r]Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

24 Then he which had received the one talent came and said, [s]Lord, [t]I knew thee that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strewed:

25 And I [u]was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth; lo, there thou hast that is thine.

26 His lord answered and said unto him, [x]Thou wicked and slothful servant, thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strewed;

27 Thou [y]oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own [z]with usury.

28 Take [a]therefore the talent from him, and give it unto him which hath ten talents.

29 For [b]unto every one that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundance: but from him that hath not, [c]shall be taken away even that which he hath.

30 And [d]cast ye the unprofitable servant into [e]outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. [Practical Observations.] with certain portions of his property, to be employed by them as his agents, or stewards.—Christ, as ascended into heaven, to return in due season to judge the world, is this Master: professed Christians are his servants: "the talents" represent the powers of body and mind, natural or acquired abilities, time, health, influence, authority, wealth, gifts, privileges, or offices in the church; in short every thing, of which a good or a bad use may be made, or which may be left unemployed. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, 21:33—39. Luke 16:1—8. 19:11—27, vv. 12,13. 1 Cor. 4:1—5. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) It cannot be supposed, consistently with Scripture, that the improvement of natural powers, by unregenerate men, can entitle them to regenerating grace: for all unregenerate men are carnal, and "alienated from God;" and therefore wholly indisposed and unwilling to improve their natural powers, according to their bounden duty. (Notes, Rom. 8:5—9. 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 10. Phil. 2:12,13.) But the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, producing a holy judgment and heart, teach, incline, and enable a man to make a good use of all other things: so that this improvement of talent does not make men Christians, but evidence that they are such; whilst the contrary conduct evinces the hypocrisy of a man's professed faith in Christ.—The five talents given to the first servant, the two to the second, and the one to the third, represent the different proportions in which the great Head of the church, and Lord of the universe, intrusts his servants with various advantages, "as it seemeth good in his sight." The expression "according to his several ability," may denote, that every man has that portion, which best suits the station intended for him, in the church and in the community; and which would suffice, if made a good use of, to prove him a useful, honourable, and accepted servant. (Notes, Rom. 12:3—8. 1 Cor. 12:4—11,27—31. Eph. 4:11—13.) It should not be concluded from what follows, that they who receive most are always or generally the most faithful: for the contrary is very commonly the case, and the Scripture teaches us to expect that it will be so. But our Lord thus shows, that an account must be rendered of the weakest abilities, and smallest advantages, as well as of those which are more eminent and distinguishing: and that it will be no excuse for a man to plead, he had but little entrusted to him, if he neglects to make a good use of that little. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Luke 16:9—12.) For the conduct of the servant, who buried his talent, represents the character of formalists and hypocrites, who make no good use of their abilities, opportunities, and advantages; who neglect the duties of their stations; who live to themselves, and are engaged in earthly pursuits; who deem it enough not to do positive evil; and who are destitute of zeal and love; and who indulge sloth, or are actuated by envy, discontent, and selfish passions. (Marg. Ref. i. Note, 24—30.)—Traded. (16) Εἠργασατο, wrought. Comp. Luke 19:13,15,16. Gr.

V. 19—23. "After a long time the Lord of those servants cometh, and reckoneth with them." Unbelievers either conclude that Christ will never come to judgment; or that event appears to them so doubtful and distant, that it has no influence on their conduct: (Note, 24:45—51.) and believers have "need of patience, that, after they have done the will of God, they may receive the promise." (Note, Heb. 10:35—39, v. 36.)—The first servant being called, stated that he had traded successfully with his five talents, and had doubled the sum. This represents the humble and thankful consciousness, with which the true Christian will at length reflect on the labours of faith and love, in which he has employed his time, abilities, and providential advantages, in the service of Christ and his church, and which are the infallible evidences of his sincerity. Accordingly, the Master highly commended this "good and faithful servant;" and assured him of advancement to a post of far higher rank and authority, with immediate admission into "the joy of his Lord," as prepared for his friends, and resembling his own felicity. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) This doubtless relates to the final happiness of believers. Faithfulness, in a lower condition, is, indeed, often here recompensed by advancement to a higher and more honourable service: but hereafter true Christians shall be "made kings and priests unto God," and shall reign with their divine Redeemer, in glory and joy inexpressible and inconceivable.—The case of the servant who had received two talents, and the gracious acceptance and recompense with which he met, exactly correspond with the other; and we are thus taught, that inferior endowments and advantages, when faithfully improved, will be as graciously accepted as those which are greater. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 18:23—27, vv. 23,24. 24:45—51, vv. 46,47. Luke 12:35—46, v. 44. 16:1—8, vv. 1,2. 19:11—27, vv. 15—19. Rev. 2:24—28. 3:4—6,12,13,20—22.)

V. 24—30. The servant, "who had received the one talent," and had hid it in the earth, gave a widely different account of his motives and conduct, and met with a very different reception. He avowed, that he knew his Lord to be a hard and unreasonable master, who expected more than his servants could perform, or than he had given them the means of effecting; like a man, who should expect to "reap where he had not sown." Being, therefore, afraid of any miscarriage, should he attempt to trade with the money, he had concealed it in the earth: and though it was not increased, yet it was not wasted.—This describes the heart and inward thoughts and reasonings of many decent and plausible hypocrites, and the motives of their slothfulness. They are "carnally minded," and at enmity with the holy character and law of God: they murmur against his providence, sovereignty, and method of salvation: they disbelieve his promises, suppose his service to be perilous, unprofitable, and detrimental: they complain, that he requires more than they are capable of performing, and that he punishes men for what they cannot help: they pervert the doctrines of Revelation to support these conclusions, and confound the want of inclination to what is good, with a want of natural ability. Thus they excuse their sloth and selfishness, and cast the blame of their misconduct on God; and they suppose their unfruitfulness to be justifiable, because they are not outwardly so immoral as some other persons. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Luke 15:25—32, vv. 29,30. 19:11—27, vv. 20,21.)—To these most injurious insinuations of this servant, his Lord answered, that even if the case had been as he stated, he might and ought to have put out his money on good security, and that some increase might have been made of it; and therefore he was, by his own confession, a "wicked and slothful servant." This shows, that such men will be condemned out of their own mouths; as conscious that they might have done better if they would: they will therefore be left without excuse, and will as certainly be condemned for sloth and negligence, as others will be for open infidelity, impiety, or profligacy. 'This is not a concession, that the Master was truly so, but an argument out of his own mouth to condemn him, for not acting suitably to his own hard conceptions of his Lord. (Luke 19:22.) Whitby. (Luke 15:31.)—His Lord then ordered the talent to be taken from him, and given to him that had ten talents: on which Christ observed, as he had done before; that it was glory, and all the holy angels with him, *s*then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory:

32 And *h*before him shall be gathered all nations; and *i*he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats:

33 And he shall set *k*the sheep on *l*his right hand, but the goats on the left.

34 Then shall *m*the King say unto them on his right hand, *n*Come, ye blessed of my Father, *o*inherit the kingdom *p*prepared for you *q*from the foundation of the world:

35 For *r*I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was *r*thirsty, and ye gave me drink; *t*I was a stranger, and ye took me in;

36 *u*Naked, and ye clothed me; I *x*was sick, and ye visited me; *y*I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

37 Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, *z*when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink?

38 When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee?

V. 31—33. In order more fully to explain and confirm the foregoing parabolical representations, our Lord next spake one of the most interesting and sublime discourses which we meet with even in the holy Scriptures: and it is wonderful, that any person can read it, and yet suppose the Speaker to be no more than man; when there is such a divine authority and dignity in it, as we may venture to say, could never have, with propriety, been assumed by any mere creature, however exalted. Having previously and by degrees, drawn the attention of the disciples to the great season of retribution, he here spake concerning it in the character of the sovereign Judge. The time will come, when "the Son of man," even he who appeared in human nature, will be manifested in his divine glory, attended by all the holy angels, as his servants and worshippers; and then "he will sit upon the throne of his glory," as the Judge of the world. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, 16:24—28, v. 27. Ps. 96:11—13. John 5:20—23. 2 Thes. 1:5 —10. Jude 14—16. Rev. 20:11—15.) On this grand and awful occasion, there will be gathered before his tribunal, not only the disciples, or the Jews, or all professed Christians, but "all nations," all the inhabitants of the earth, being raised from the dead for that purpose: and he will separate the immense multitude, with as much ease and exactness, as "a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." For there will not be the least danger of his mistaking any man's character, motives, or state; nor any possibility of opposition or escape; nor any danger lest any one should be overlooked, or remain disguised before him. (Note, John 6:36—40, vv. 39,40.)—What less than omnipotence and omniscience can effect such an exact separation of the whole human species? —This being done, he will set the sheep (the proper emblem of his harmless, gentle, useful, and holy people) on his right hand, in token of their acceptance and honour; and the goats (the emblem of the unholy nature and character of unbelievers) at his left hand, as rejected and exposed to condemnation. (Marg. Ref. h—l.)—Shall separate. (32) Αφορισει. —Divideth.] Αφοριζει. Αφοριζω (εκ απο et ὁριζω, *definio, termino. V. 34—40. Then "the King," not only of the Jews, or of the church, but of the whole world, (as our Lord on this occasion called himself,) will address the company at his right hand, as the "blessed of his Father;" his chosen, redeemed, regenerate, adopted, and beloved children, whom he has determined to render most blessed for evermore. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) He will call them "to come to him," that they may behold and share his glory, and concur with him in the judgment about to be given upon the wicked; and that they may inherit the kingdom," or that confluence of all honours, riches, felicities, and pleasures, "which had been prepared for them from the foundation of the world," in the counsels of God's everlasting love and mercy. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 19—23. Luke 12:22—34, v. 32 Rom. 8:14—17. 1 Cor. 6:1—6, vv. 2,3. Jam. 1:12. 2:5—7, v. 5.) And, in order to show that they are indeed the persons for whom this inheritance was prepared, he will next before the whole assembled world make known their good works, as the effect of their faith and love. They had on earth proved themselves his obedient and devoted friends: for they had given him meat when he was hungry, and drink when he was thirsty; when he was a stranger and destitute, they had hospitably entertained him; when in want of raiment they had clothed him; when sick, they had visited and tended upon him; and when in prison, through oppression or persecution, they had owned him, and had come to inquire into his wants, and to administer to his comforts.—On hearing this, the righteous are represented, as inquiring when they had ever seen him in such circumstances, and relieved him in this manner. For they were not conscious of having done any service worthy of this honourable notice and abundant recompense. To which the King will answer, that "inasmuch as they did it to the least of these his brethren, (the poor afflicted Christians whom they relieved for his sake, who will be present to bear grateful testimony to "their labour of love," and liberal and active kindness, and whom the King of Glory will condescend to own as his brethren,) "they did it unto him." (Marg. Ref. r—b. Notes, 12:46—50. John 13:31—35, vv. 34,35. 15:12—16. Gal. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10. Jam. 1:27. 2:14—18.) It is impossible that human language can express greater encouragement to self-denying, assiduous, laborious, and expensive charity to poor Christians, for the sake of our common Lord, than that which is contained in this declaration. We must not, however, by any means, suppose that acts of liberality, from whatever motive, will constitute a man's title to eternal felicity: nor can there be a more fatal delusion, than this too common, but groundless inference from this and a few similar texts. For many who are liberal, humane, and compassionate in some instances, live habitually in the practice of one or other of those sins, concerning which it is expressly said, that "they who do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." (Notes, Gal. 5:19—21. Eph. 5:5—7.) And as none but believers are "the brethren of Christ;" so love to Christ must be the motive of the liberality and kindness here spoken of. The matter may therefore be thus stated: there is no salvation for a sinner, but by the free mercy of God; no mercy but through the mediation and merits of his beloved Son; no interest in Christ, (at least for those who hear, or might hear or read the gospel, after they are capable of understanding good from evil,) except by faith in him; no justifying faith, but that "which worketh by love;" (Note, Gal. 5:1—6, v. 6.) no love to Christ, which does not imply love to his people, his example, and his precepts; no genuine love to his people, which does not influence a man to do good to them, as he has ability and opportunity, and as he sees them in difficult and necessitous circumstances. But whenever any one is habitually induced to self-denying beneficence to others, especially to such as he thinks disciples of Christ, out of love to his name; he gives an unequivocal proof, that he is a true believer, a justified person, a member of Christ's mystical body, and interested in all his purchased blessings (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:6—9. 9: Heb. 6:9,10. 1 John 2:7—11. 3:11—24.) At the same time it is impossible that this man should be proud of his beneficence, or trust in it; that he should be liberal merely out of ostentation, or to compensate for indulged iniquities, or to atone for former sins: for these things would prove him an absolute stranger to true repentance and genuine faith, and every evangelical principle of obedience. So that the actions here mentioned will be produced, as evidences of the excellency and efficacy of justifying faith and the love of Christ; of a person's having been a real believer and one who loved Christ; and to show that it is in every way proper, the Lord should honour him in heaven, who thus proved himself his zealous friend on earth. (Notes, 10:40—42. John 14:15—17,21—24. 21:15—17. Eph. 6:21—24, v. 24. 2 Thes. 1:3,4,5—10, v. 5—7. 1 Pet. 1:8,9.)—Compassion and good-will to men in general, shown by a decidedly loving and beneficent conduct, and love to enemies and persecutors, for Christ's sake, in obedience to his commandments and in imitation of his example, are the genuine fruits of justifying faith: but there is a peculiar propriety, in this fruit of love to Christ, shown in loving his brethren, for his sake, being selected in this concise declaration of the proceedings of the great and decisive day of retribution. Even the poorest Christian manifests the same spirit of love to Christ, by kind actions to his brethren, and to all men for the Lord's sake; which will be also made known at the same time, as the evidences of his living faith and merciful acceptance.—Prepared. (34) Ἡτοιμασμενην. V. 41—46. The Judge next shows the awful reverse. He declares, that he will address all those "on his left hand" as "cursed," lying under the curse of the broken law, strangers to the blessings of the gospel, and justly deserving of the final wrath and vengeance of God. He will sentence them to "depart from Him," the only Author of salvation to sinners, and the Fountain of life and felicity to all creatures; for many of them had in their hearts bid him "depart from them, as they desired not the knowledge of his ways." He will doom them "to fire," the dreadful emblem of the wrath of God, as causing the most excruciating pains, of which we have any conception. This fire will be "everlasting;" which would be an unmeaning addition, if the wicked were not to continue in it eternally. It had been indeed "prepared" originally "for the devil and his angels," those first apostates from and rebels against God; but as the wicked held with them, and would not separate from their service, it must be their portion also. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Gal. 3:6—14. 2 Thes. 1:5—10, vv. 8,9. Rev. 20:11—15.)—No doubt impenitent sinners of every age and nation will then be judged; but those, to whom the Scriptures are sent, are chiefly concerned in these previous delineations of the final judgment, and its process and event; and therefore our Lord represents nothing more, than the ground on which false professors of Christianity will be condemned. It will then be proved against them, that they had no love to Christ, and therefore no true faith in him; seeing they refused to relieve him, when they saw him in necessity and distress, and had ability and opportunity of doing it. 'For so close is the union between Christ and his members, that he looks upon the favours conferred on them as done to himself, and promises accordingly a reward for them: (Matt. 10:42.) and also threatens punishment to them who do neglect, and are injurious to them, as if they had been so to him. (45 ... Acts 9:4.)' Whitby.—These, however, will be as ready to deny or palliate their guilt, as true believers to disclaim all merit in their services: but the Judge will prove his charge, and stop their mouths, by showing their selfish neglect of his poor disciples, and their refusal to relieve them in their distresses. This alone will be sufficient to evince that they were unbelievers; even if no injustice or oppression, no open profligacy or secret licentiousness, nor any other gross wickedness should be adduced against them. 'It is not sufficient to preserve us from that dreadful sentence, "Depart from me, &c." that we have done no evil, if we have been deficient in those acts of charity and mercy we owe to the members of Christ's body.' Theophylact. Being therefore evidently proved to be under the condemnation of the law, and entitled to no benefit from the gospel; nay, exposed to deeper condemnation for their neglect of it, or their hypocrisy and abuse of their privileges; they will be left without plea, or the least power of resistance or escape; and be constrained to "go away into everlasting punishment," whilst the righteous will be received into everlasting life and felicity. (Marg. Ref. k—o. Notes, Ps. 9:17. 21:8—12. Is. 30:14. Dan. 12:2,3. Mark 9:43—50. John 3:19—21. 2 Cor. 5:9—12, v. 10. Rev. 20:11—15, vv. 14,15.)—The original word is the same in both clauses, (αιωνιος): and he must be blinded by Satan in no ordinary degree, who will risk his immortal soul and its eternal interests on interpreting the same word temporary in one clause, and eternal in another, of the same verse: and if the punishment be eternal, here can be no place for annihilation, or for final restitution. The contrast also between "punishment," and "life," is carefully to be observed. (Notes, Rom. 5:20,21. 6:21—23.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. It is most important for us all continually to be reminded of death and judgment, and of that discrimination of characters, which will soon be made. Immense multitudes of infidels, profligates, Pharisees, and apostates, are thronging the broad road to destruction: but this is not all; alas! a large proportion even of those who appear to be followers of Christ, and are externally admitted to the communion of the saints, will be found "foolish virgins;" having indeed the lamp in their hands, but no grace in their hearts. With what seriousness, diligence, and fervent prayer, should we then "examine ourselves whether we be in the faith!" How afraid of being deceived, where so much is at stake, and so many come short of eternal life! How earnestly should we seek for heavenly wisdom, and desire to be found upright in the sight of God, rather than to be approved by our ill-judging fellow-sinners!—It is indeed to be lamented, that whilst the heavenly Bridegroom tarries, even true Christians are too apt to be drowsy and inattentive: yet, notwithstanding all defects on the one hand, and all fair appearances on the other; there is an essential difference between the weakest believer and the most specious hypocrite. This sometimes appears even here: the unexpected summons of death may throw the Christian into an alarm; but, proceeding without delay to trim his lamp, the grace which before lay almost dormant, shines forth more bright; and his serious self-examination and fervent prayer bring humility, faith, hope, patience, love, and every holy affection into lively exercise; so that all around perceive him to be ready, and "meet to be a partaker of the inheritance of the saints in light." On the other hand, the mere professor, in such circumstances, often detects his consciousness of hypocrisy and impresses the minds of beholders with a gloomy fear, that "his lamp is going out," and about to be extinguished in utter darkness. We may compassionate such persons, but we can give them little help: we should direct them to him, who sells all the blessings of salvation "without money and without price:" but the hour is unseasonable, and the time is short; nor can they well know that their prayers are not the dictates of mere selfishness, and their repentance constrained and insincere. How dreadful then will be the case of those who do not seek "the things which accompany salvation," till the time is past! who do not knock, till the door is finally closed! But, however it may appear at death, assuredly no one will partake of the marriage-supper of the Lamb, who has not in this world "washed his robes, and made them white" in his atoning blood; and who is not a partaker of his sanctifying Spirit. Let us then make no delay, but be earnest in our preparation for the feast; and let us ever be upon our watch, for "we know not either the day or the hour when our Lord cometh."

V. 14—30. In some respects, "the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man travelling into a far country, and delivering his goods unto his own servants." Whatever any one possesses is entrusted to him by the great Lord of all, who will at length call him to an account for the use which he has made of it. The holy law requires us to devote the whole, in perfect love, to the service of God, and to the benefit of our neighbour; and denounces its awful curse on every one, who in any instance, or at any time, fails of so doing: but the gospel inwardly teaches and disposes the true believer to attempt this sincerely, though feebly; from the time when he begins in any degree to experience "the joy of God's salvation." He believes his word respecting the future judgment and its important consequences; and he gives implicit credit to his promises and threatenings. By faith he perceives his danger as a sinner, and fears and flees from it; and at the same time he discovers his Refuge, and in hope repairs to it. Having obtained peace with God, and peace of conscience through the atoning blood of Christ; his "faith works by love," and his language is, "What shall I render to the LORD, for all his benefits?" This humble love and gratitude, uniting with hatred of sin, contempt of the world, love to the brethren, and compassion for perishing sinners, impels him to devote himself, and all his abilities and advantages, to the service of Christ; and to do good, in his church and in the world, according to his opportunity, and in exact proportion to the vigour of his faith and hope. This obedience distinguishes the

CHAPTER XXVI.

Jesus foretells his crucifixion after two days, 1, 2. The chief priests conspire against him, 3—5. A woman pours precious ointment on his head: the disciples censure, but Jesus commends her, 6—13. Judas bargains with the chief priests to betray him, 14—16. Jesus eats the passover, and marks out the traitor, 17—25. He institutes the Lord's supper, 26—29; and foretells that all his apostles would forsake him, and Peter deny him, 30—35. His agony and prayer in the garden, 36—46. He is betrayed and apprehended, 47—50. A disciple cuts off the high-priest's servant's ear; but Jesus forbids all resistance, 51—56. He is arraigned before Caiaphas, falsely accused, condemned, and treated with insult and indignity, 57—68. Peter thrice denies him, with peculiar aggravations; but going out he weeps bitterly, 69—75.

AND it came to pass, [a]when Jesus had finished all these sayings, he said unto his disciples, real disciple of Christ from every other man: the self-righteous Pharisee, the self-wise infidel, the careless sinner, the formal professor of the gospel, are alike unacquainted with these evangelical principles of devoted diligence in the service of a crucified Saviour.—It is the real Christian's liberty, privilege, honour, interest, and satisfaction, to be employed as the Redeemer's servant, and as his instrument in promoting his glory and the benefit of his people: and "the love of Christ even constrains him to live no longer to himself, but to him that died for him, and rose again." (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) According to the number of his talents, he will become a blessing to others, by his example, influence, conversation, and labours; by the use which he makes of his time, money, and abilities; by his relative conduct in his family; and by serving the Lord, as a minister, magistrate, or private Christian: and whether he has had five talents, two, one, or only a small portion of one; "he will not be ashamed, but have confidence before Christ at his coming." Nay, he may now humbly "rejoice in testimony of his conscience;" and, giving the Lord all the glory, he may look forward to death and judgment, assured of being then received with "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." "Let us not then be weary of well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—But let every one dread the doom of the unprofitable servant: for it is not enough that men do not spend their Lord's goods upon their lusts, or waste their time and talents in sin; even those who "bury them in the earth," will be left without excuse. Whatever they may profess, they dislike the character and word of the Lord: they count his service irksome and unprofitable; they dare not trust his promise, and they are dissatisfied with his providence; and, because they may not have the pre-eminence, or take the lead, and manage things in their own way, they sit down in sullen discontent; and will do nothing, because they cannot do every thing. But many of those excuses and objections which pass current here, will be refuted and silenced at last: and every unfruitful professor will be condemned out of his own mouth, and consigned to "outer darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth." For whatever else men may possess, who are destitute of sanctifying grace; they will soon be deprived of it, and have nothing but the additional condemnation of having been ungrateful for so many mercies. But the most indigent believer is rich, and shall have abundance, and his felicity will be for ever increasing. Let us not then envy sinners, or covet any of their perishing and dangerous possessions.

V. 31—40. Our gracious Redeemer once "humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross:" but now he reigns the Sovereign of the world; and ere long he shall appear in glory, attended by "all the holy angels" to judge the nations of the earth. Before his tribunal we must all appear; and every effort to escape, to conceal, to resist, or to prevaricate, will then be entirely unavailing. With infinite ease and exactness, he will "bring to light the hidden things of darkness," and develope the secrets of every heart; he will show the real motive of every action, and the true character of every individual; and he will infallibly separate his true disciples, from all other men in the world. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:3—5.) In that decisive hour, "the King of glory" will not be ashamed to own, as "his brethren, his sisters, or his mother," the least and meanest of his chosen flock. And, if we would possess a good hope, that he will then address us as "the blessed of his Father," and call us to him, that we may "inherit the kingdom prepared for us from the beginning of the world;" we must now recognise our Saviour and future Judge, as disguised under the mean attire of these his beloved brethren. When we see a believer hungry, thirsty, a stranger, or in want of proper clothing, we should suppose that our Saviour himself stands before us, requires us to own our relation to him, and calls upon us to give him food or raiment, or to provide him lodging or entertainment: and we should ask ourselves, whether we can find in our hearts to drive him from our door? (Notes, Cant. 5:2,3.) And when we hear of pious persons being sick, or in prison, and wanting advice, attendance, or other relief; we should suppose that Jesus is in these circumstances, and sends to us by name to come and "minister unto him." Let us then renounce our own ease, interest, convenience, indulgence, and decoration: that we may show our ardent gratitude for his salvation, by abounding in this "work of faith, and labour of love:" and should we even be mistaken in the character of those, for whom we thus deny ourselves from love to Christ; he will certainly accept and recompense our services. (Note, 10:40—42.)—But alas! how little do we see of "these fruits of the Spirit" even among professed Christians! Who does not think, that he should have counted it an honour to have entertained Christ when on earth? But how few are willing to retrench greatly from their unnecessary expenses, to relieve these his representatives and brethren? Many however will even part with their money, who will not subject themselves to the hardship and inconvenience of visiting the sick, and such as are in prisons, or other recesses of misery and distress; by which means their bounty is distributed at random, does comparatively little good, and will often be shown to spring, rather from an easy temper, than from a disinterested self-denying love of others for the sake of Christ. But "while we have time, let us" lay ourselves out "in doing good to all men, especially to them that are of the household of faith:" and, even if we have but little in our power, let us endeavour by that little to show our goodwill, and what we would do if we had more.—They, who most abound in good works, will be the least apt to glory in them: nay, they will be, as it were, surprised at the gracious mention, which will at last be made of them. Yet those services, which the humble believer thought nothing of at the time, and soon entirely forgot, as well as those which were concealed from men, will all be brought to light, and graciously recompensed by our King: not a crust of bread, or a cup of water, given for his sake to a poor brother, shall pass unnoticed; but every instance of this kind will be adduced as an evidence, that the giver was a faithful friend, and a loyal subject, to "the Lord of glory," and a proper person to be numbered with those, whom "he delighteth to honour," and to bless. (Notes, 10:40—42. Heb. 6:9,10.)

V. 41—46. What tongue can describe, what words can express, or even convey a faint idea, of the horror and despair of the wicked, when placed at the left hand of their omnipotent and omniscient Judge! While conscious of their guilt, and calling in vain "on the rocks and mountains to fall on them," they shall behold his awful countenance clouded with an indignant frown; and hear his mouth, which used to invite the weary sinner to come to him, sternly say to them, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" Then all their works will be produced, to demonstrate the justice of the tremendous sentence: and their omissions alone, and selfish neglect of poor Christians, whom they ought to have loved "with a pure heart fervently," for the Lord's sake, whilst they were indulging themselves, or heaping up riches, will prove them unbelievers, and deprive them of all relief from the mercy of the gospel. They may avow, that they would gladly have ministered unto Christ, had they seen him in his humiliation; but, inasmuch as they refused to "do it to his brethren, they did it not to him." If this alone will prove a man, otherwise moral and decent, to be an enemy of Christ, a child of the devil, and "a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction; where will oppressors, persecutors, blasphemers, and profligates appear?" Yet all resistance to the power of the Judge will be hopeless, even that of united thousands of millions, combined with the devil and his angels: every plea will be refused, "every mouth will be stopped: the wicked shall be silent in darkness;" "the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." But the reflection is too tremendous to be dwelt upon. Let us then take warning, flee from the wrath to come, and seek that faith in Christ, which "worketh by love" of him and his people and cause, and by obedience to his commandments; that we may abound in all the fruits of righteousness here, and that, when "the wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment," we may be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting.'

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVI. V. 1, 2. Our Lord had closed his public ministry, when he left the temple: he had afterwards given his disciples many important warnings and instructions; and after the sublime representation which he had made of his future coming to judgment, he informed them of the immediate approach of his sufferings. (Notes, 23:37—39, v. 39. 24,25.) After two days the feast of the passover would be celebrated, and then he should be betrayed into the hands of his enemies, and put to death by crucifixion. Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 20—24.) 6 ¶ Now when Jesus was [l]in Bethany, in the house of [m]Simon the leper, 7 There [n]came unto him a woman having an alabaster-box of [o]very precious ointment, and poured it on his head as he sat at meat.

8 But when his disciples saw it, [p]they had indignation, saying, [q]To what purpose is this waste?

9 For [r]this ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor.

10 When Jesus understood it, he said unto them, [s]Why trouble ye the woman? for she hath wrought [t]a good work upon me.

11 For [u]ye have the poor always with you, [x]but me ye have not always.

12 For [y]in that she hath poured this ointment on my body, she did it for my burial.

13 Verily I say unto you, [z]Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, [a]there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. [Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ Then [b]one of the twelve, called [c]Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests, 15 And said unto them, [d]What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they covenanted with him for [e]thirty pieces of silver.

16 And from that time [f]he sought opportunity to betray him.

of the variety and intenseness of his approaching sufferings, though he met them with the most entire calmness and serenity.—This seems to have been peculiar to him: none of the prophets or apostles knew beforehand what they should be called to suffer. Even holy Paul says, "I go up to Jerusalem, not knowing the things which shall befall me there."—This peculiarity should be carefully noted, when the intrepid and cool courage and resolution of Jesus in the complete foreknowledge of his unparalleled sufferings, is the subject of our meditation. (Notes, Acts 20:22—24. 1 Pet. 4:1,2. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.)—The contrast between the words of our Lord concerning himself, as "the Son of man," in these verses, and those in the foregoing chapter, "The Son of man shall come in his glory," is peculiarly worthy of our observation. (Note, 25:31—33.)

V. 3—5. The members of the Jewish Sanhedrim, the grand council of the nation, being met together at the palace of the high-priest, consulted how they might get Jesus into their power, in order to put him to death. Having deliberated on the subject, they agreed to attempt it by subtlety, or contrivance, and not by open force: and concluded that it would be better to defer it till after the feast of the passover; lest the people, whom they supposed to favour him, should make an insurrection for his rescue, if he were apprehended, while such numbers from all quarters were assembled in the city.—(Marg. Ref.) But it pleased God to defeat this intention: as it was proper that Christ, the true paschal Lamb, should be sacrificed at that season; and that his death and resurrection should be rendered the more extensively known.—'Maimonides saith, it was the custom among the Jews to punish those who rebelled against the sentence of the Judge, or the high-priest, or were notoriously criminal, at one of the three feasts, because then only by reason of the public congress of the people, all might hear and fear. (Deut. 17:12,13.) From this received custom the fathers of the Sanhedrim seem willing to recede, for fear of the multitude; but having so fair an offer made by Judas, they embrace that season.' Whitby.—'God himself, and not men, appointed the time in which Christ should be crucified.' Beza. (Note, Ps. 76:10.)

V. 6—13. St. John fixes the date of this transaction to six days before the passover: (John 12:1.) and as it is utterly improbable that it should have occurred twice in so short a time, and with exactly the same circumstances, we must conclude that the other evangelists have related it out of the order of time in which it happened.—Our Lord was at this time entertained at Bethany, by "Simon the leper," who had probably been cleansed by him. But Lazarus was a guest, and Martha one who waited on them. Mary, the sister of Lazarus, doubtless was the woman who anointed him; and the late extraordinary favour conferred on her, in the resurrection of her beloved brother, excited those fervent and grateful affections which influenced her conduct. Having therefore in her possession an alabaster-box of very costly and fragrant ointment, such as was used about the persons of the wealthy, according to the custom of those days; she came in before the company, broke off the top of the box, and poured the ointment on the head of Christ as he sat at meat, anointing his feet also with part of it; so that the house was "filled with the odour of the ointment." (Marg. Ref. l—o. Note, Mark 14:3—9, v. 3.) When the disciples saw this action, they were highly displeased, and inquired, what end could be answered by this "waste of the ointment," which might have been sold for a considerable sum of money; and this would have done much good, if given in alms to the poor. We find that Judas, from bad motives, started the objection; yet it is probable that the other disciples joined in it, in a manner which was not only discouraging to Mary, but highly disrespectful to Christ. (Note, John 12:1—8, vv. 3—6.) But he, knowing the simple, humble, thankful, fervent love, and reverential regard to him, from which this action sprang, was pleased to vindicate her from these censures. She had rightly judged, that nothing could be too costly to be used in honouring him; nor any thing wasted which was spent in his service: and, though in general his disciples must show their love to him by doing good to men, especially their Christian brethren for his sake; (Note, 25:34—41.) yet the present circumstances justified a deviation. Why then did they trouble one who had done a good and acceptable work, in thus honouring him by such means as were in her power, when others were about to betray, insult, and most cruelly use him? They would always have poor persons, whom they might relieve whenever they would: but his personal presence was not long to be continued with them. And, though Mary knew it not, he was about to be put to death; and this might be regarded as the anointing for his burial, performed a little beforehand; (for they would have no opportunity of performing it afterwards;) in which last expenses, as a testimony of respect to beloved friends, men were not used to be parsimonious. He further assured the disciples, that this action was so acceptable to him, that he would take care it should be reported, as a memorial of her faith and love, to all future ages, and in all places where his gospel should ever be preached.—This may be considered as a most remarkable prophecy: he would influence the evangelists to record this incident, which might appear trivial, among the important actions of his public life; and take care that it should never be erased, to the end of time. V. 14—16. Judas, notwithstanding his plausible conduct and apostolical office, was a hypocrite, and a covetous dishonest man. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, Mark 14:10,11. John 6:66—71, vv. 70, 71. 13:1—5, v. 2, 18—30, vv. 27—30.)—Knowing therefore, that the chief priests and rulers greatly desired to get Jesus into their hands, without disturbance, he framed the design of conducting their officers to him, in the absence of the people. Probably, he hoped to ingratiate himself, and to obtain further advantages, beyond the present recompense. Perhaps he expected, that Jesus would miraculously liberate himself; and so no fatal consequences would ensue from his treachery. The reproof implied in our Lord's commendation of the woman's conduct, which from base motives he had condemned, seems also to have exasperated him; and thus Satan found access to hurry him forward to the execution of his infamous design. Accordingly, he obtained admission to the chief priests, and proposed to betray his Master to them, demanding what they would give him for that service: and they (loving the treachery, though they doubtless despised and detested the traitor) offered him thirty pieces of silver, supposed to have been shekels, in value about 3*l.* 15*s.* This was the sum appointed by the law to be paid for a slave who had been slain by accident. 19 And [m]the disciples did as Jesus had appointed them; [n]and they made ready the passover.

20 ¶ Now [o]when the even was come, [p]he sat down with the twelve.

21 And as they did eat, he said, [q]Verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me.

22 And [r]they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I?

23 And he answered and said, [s]He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me.

24 The [t]Son of man goeth, as it is [u]written of him; [x]but wo unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born.

25 Then [y]Judas, which betrayed him, answered and said, Master, is it I? He said unto him, [z]Thou hast said. [Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And [a]as they were eating, [b]Jesus took bread, and [*]blessed it, [c]and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, [d]Take, eat; [e]this is my body.

27 And [f]he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, [g]Drink ye all of it:

V. 20. Without doubt our Lord ate the Passover at the time which was appointed by the law, and which was customary among the Jews. (Note, Ex. 12:3—10.)—St. Mark says expressly, "when they killed the passover;" and St. Luke, "when the passover must be killed." (Mark 14:12. Luke 22:7.)—The passover was celebrated at the close of the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, and just when the fifteenth day began; for the Jews reckoned from evening to evening. "The first day of unleavened bread," strictly speaking, began at the very time when the Jews were eating the paschal lamb: but, in a more general sense, the whole fourteenth day, in which among other preparations for the passover, leaven was put out of their houses, might be so called. (Notes, Ex. 12:15—20.)—'It is a very remarkable circumstance, that our Saviour was crucified, and our deliverance from the bondage of sin completed, in the same month, and on the same day of the month, that the Israelites were delivered from the bondage of Egypt, by their departure from that land. For the Israelites went out of Egypt, and Christ was put to death, on the fifteenth day of the month Nisan.' Bp. Porteus.

V. 21—24. When the two disciples had made all ready; at the usual time in the evening, Jesus, and the apostles who were with him, went to the house which he had marked out.—'He seems not to have gone to Jerusalem that morning: so that it is probable he spent most of the day in retirement for meditation and prayer.' Doddridge.—While they were celebrating the passover, our Lord assured the disciples, that "one of them should betray him" into the hand of his enemies. Thus he gave Judas to understand, that he was fully acquainted with his conduct, and prepared the minds of the others for the event. This declaration, however, greatly grieved and troubled them. It does not appear, that any of them suspected Judas; they had no reason to suspect each other; they could not suppose that Christ suspected them groundlessly: and, though they did not think themselves capable of so base and ungrateful a treachery; they yet put the question severally, each respecting himself, as anxious to be assured that they were not intended. Our Lord therefore gave a general intimation of the traitor, by observing that he was one "who dipped his hand with him in the dish:" probably others of them did this from time to time, but Judas might be doing so at that instant: this, however, was intended to expose the baseness of his conduct, as well as to mark him out to the disciples; and afterwards (I apprehend) Jesus distinguished him more plainly by giving him a sop. (Marg. Ref. o—s. Notes, Ps. 41:9. 55:12—15. John 13:18—30, vv. 18,26,27.) To this he added, that the Messiah was about to be taken off by a violent death; and that nothing would take place, but what had been determined and predicted concerning him: yet that would by no means excuse the traitor's conduct, or lessen the severity of his punishment; for he would be doomed to such misery in another world, that it "would have been good for him if he had never been born." (Marg. Ref. t—x. Note, Luke 22:21—23.) This could not have been the case, if he should ever be liberated from punishment, and made partaker of eternal happiness: for that would infinitely overbalance all possible temporary suffering, whatever its acuteness and continuance might be; and would therefore prove his existence, upon the whole, to be an invaluable blessing.—'The prediction of this event, that Jesus should suffer, and by the treachery of Judas, did lay on Judas no antecedent necessity of doing this action: because it did not lessen the wo due to him for it; but only doth suppose in God a knowledge, how the will of man, left to his own freedom, will determine or incline itself.' Whitby. Surely, it implies also, that God determined to leave Judas to himself: and if this foreknowledge and predetermination did not interfere with Judas's free agency and accountableness; it does not appear, how any foreknowledge and predetermination to leave men to themselves can interfere with their free agency and accountableness. It is wonderful that thinking and studious men do not see, that the whole system of prophecy is a direct and full confutation of all objections, on this ground, against the doctrine of predestination.—The predicted events cannot possibly fail of accomplishment: they must therefore either be absolutely decreed by the all-wise God, or there must be some necessity which cannot be overcome even by the Deity himself. The first is Christian predestination, the latter is Heathen fatalism: but neither interferes with man's free agency and accountableness; for he still acts voluntarily, according to the prevailing inclinations of his heart.

V. 25. At length Judas also inquired, whether he were the person. He probably feared, that his silence would excite suspicion; or he meant to face out the matter, as if unconscious of guilt. The answer of our Lord plainly meant, that he was the traitor: yet, neither the awful sentence denounced on him, nor this additional proof of Christ's knowledge of his heart, had any effect, to prevent him from rushing headlong on his own destruction! V. 26—28. When the paschal lamb had been eaten, the Lord's supper was appointed; for this was substituted, to be a commemorative observance, "without shedding of blood," of redemption already made, as the passover had been a prefigurative ordinance, with "shedding of blood," of redemption to be made in the fulness of time.—Nothing can be more simple in its nature and use, than this sacred institution, yet nothing has ever been more obscured, perplexed, misunderstood, and perverted, than it has been.—Our Lord, just before his death, "took bread, and blessed it," with praise and thanksgiving: this he set apart for a sacred purpose, as the representation of his body; and he "brake it," to show that his body would be wounded, put to great torture, and undergo death, as the sacrifice for sins. He then gave it to his disciples, that each of them might eat of it, as an outward expression of their receiving the atonement and reconciliation made by his death, and in remembrance of his love and sufferings for them. In like manner "he took the cup," and, having blessed it, and given thanks as before, he gave it to them, and bade them all drink of it: for the wine in that cup represented his blood, as shed to make way for the new covenant; and to ratify it, as valid for their benefit; and especially to atone for their sins, and those of many, even of all of them who should ever believe in his name; in order that they might obtain remission of them.—The language which our Lord used, in instituting this ordinance, is manifestly figurative, and cannot admit of a literal interpretation; unless any will say, that the cup was literally the blood of Christ, or the new covenant: and this renders it the more wonderful, that any set of men should be so adventurous and absurd, as to require all Christians to believe, in contradiction to their senses and understandings, that the bread in the sacrament, after consecration, becomes the real entire living body of Christ, together with his Deity, and therefore a proper object of divine adoration. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Ez. 5:5—10, v. 5. Luke 22:19,20. 1 Cor. 10:1—5, v. 4. 11:23—28, v. 25. Gal. 4:21—31, vv. 24,25.) Indeed, the Scripture gives no intimation of any peculiar mystery, or even difficulty, in this institution. By comparing the several passages which relate to this subject, it appears that our Lord commanded his disciples to meet together in his name; and with prayer, praise, and thanksgiving, to break, distribute, and eat bread, the most salutary and universal of all those viands, by which life is sustained; and to pour out and drink wine, the most valuable and refreshing of all cordials. This action was to be performed "in remembrance of him," and of his love and his sufferings for them; and as a representation of "his body broken, and his blood shed" for their sins, in order to purchase the blessings of the new covenant; and of the method, by which they were made partakers of this salvation, even by receiving and 'feeding upon him in their hearts, by faith with thanksgiving.' By his body and blood we are doubtless to understand his human nature, as joined in personal union with his Deity: and the separation of the blood from the body, which was the immediate cause of his death, must be understood to include all his expiatory sufferings.—The holiness and dignity of the Redeemer, the depth of his humiliation, and the intenseness of his agonies; the immensity of his compassion and condescension; the deplorable condition from which he redeemed his people; the extensive efficacy of his one oblation; the honour and happiness to which he exalts believers; and the discovery made in that great transaction, of the perfect justice and unspeakable love of God, the excellency of his law, the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, and the importance of eternal things; require peculiar consideration and devout meditation, when the death of Christ is contemplated, through the medium of these outward emblems. The bread and wine were, probably, received by the apostles sitting, or reclining, and in the evening: yet no command was given about those things; and therefore the time, place, and posture must be considered as mere circumstances. (Note, Ex. 12:11—14.)—The action of communicating seems to imply an open confession of our guilt and ruined state, as justly condemned criminals, who could have no hope of pardon or salvation from any thing we could do of ourselves; a profession of our faith respecting the Person, incarnation, suretiship, and atonement of Christ, and the necessity, reality, and suitableness of his sacrifice and vicarious sufferings; an avowed dependence on this atonement, and the mercy of God, according to the covenant thus mediated; an acknowledgment of our unspeakable obligations to our gracious Benefactor, who laid down his life for us; a strong and open expression of our love and gratitude to him; a sacramental engagement to submit to and obey him, as our beloved Lord and Saviour; and a public joining of ourselves to him and his people, to walk with them in Christian fellowship, in all sacred ordinances, and devotedness to the Redeemer's service. No man can, therefore, sincerely and intelligently partake of this ordinance, who is not self-condemned and penitent; who does not with application to his own case believe the peculiar doctrines of the gospel; who does not apply in secret earnest prayer for an interest in the salvation of Christ; who lives in allowed habitual sin, or the neglect of known duty; whose heart is under the dominion of pride, malice, avarice, or any evil propensity; who makes it merely a step to preferment, or a compensation for sin, a covering of his iniquity or infidelity, a self-righteous service, or an excuse for licentiousness: for such men are "guilty of the body and blood of Christ." But the humble penitent, the trembling believer, who relies on a crucified Saviour, and longs to live to his glory, should fear no snare in this institution; it is his duty and privilege to come to it, as often as he has opportunity; and he will find it to be admirably suited to increase humility tenderness of conscience, self-examination, watchfulness, the life of faith, hope, love, gratitude, brotherly affection, and every holy disposition and consolation. These are obvious and intelligible effects of devout and frequent communicating; which show it to be as well suited to strengthen and refresh the soul and its graces, as bread and wine are to nourish and cheer the animal life. They, who are not prepared to receive the Lord's supper, cannot be fit for death and heaven; nay, acceptable prayer cannot be offered without a measure of a similar preparation of heart.—It has been much disputed, whether Judas partook of the Lord's supper, or not; but the controversy seems not to be of great consequence. If he did, his presence gives no encouragement to intruders; but rather solemnly warns every man previously to examine himself as to the state of his soul: nor can it sanction the admission of openly wicked persons; and no discipline can exclude specious hypocrites. (Note, John 13:18—30, v. 30.)—Some persons have endeavoured to prove the resurrection of Christ to be the chief doctrine of Christianity, the belief of which constitutes a man a Christian: but it is in fact rather the grand proof of all other doctrines, and the evidence that the atonement of his death was accepted. The appointment, however, of this ordinance, "to show forth the Lord's death till he come," abundantly evinces the belief of that doctrine to be most essentially distinguishing of a real Christian; and that a reliance on the atonement of Christ, for remission of sins and all the blessings of salvation, and thus spiritually eating his flesh, and drinking his blood, forms the great peculiarity of the life of faith in the Son of God. (Marg. Ref. Notes, John 6:52—58. 1 Cor. 10:14—17. 11:23—34.)—Why did our blessed Redeemer so distinguish this mournful scene? —Why 'should not his followers rather celebrate his miraculous birth, his triumphant resurrection from the dead, or his glorious ascension into heaven, than his ignominious death? ... Certainly the mode of celebration is yet more surprising. ... It is by a feast, not by a fast. It is a celebration of praise and thanksgiving, not of mourning. ... It purports to be a feast upon the body and blood of him, whose death is commemorated! ... This assuredly is the most singular commemoration of a highly venerated deceased character, that was ever heard of in the world, much more that was ever practised among the civilized part of mankind! Familiarity with the ceremony has laid our attention to it asleep: otherwise it must appear most extraordinary. Deny the great doctrines of the atonement, and of the communion of the soul with the Saviour by faith, and, I conceive, such an observance is absolutely inexplicable. But, admit these doctrines, and all is easy, all is natural, all is in the highest degree significant.' Sermons on Baptism, Confirmation, and the Lord's Supper, by the Rev. John Scott, Hull.—The papists who refuse the cup to the laity, and give an unbroken wafer, instead of broken bread, in these respects also in effect disannul our Lord's institution, and substitute another in its place.

V. 29. 'It is not long that I shall abide with you, nor shall I again celebrate this or any the like feast among you, till we meet in heaven, and partake of those joys, which are wont to be figuratively expressed by new wine.' Hammond.—'I will no more in this mortal state, drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine: but shall reserve myself for a more comfortable draught, sweeter than all the new wine earth can afford, which I shall enjoy in my Father's kingdom, whereof ye shall be blessed partakers with me.' Bp. Hall.—'The passover, which was a type of the redemption to be wrought by me, shall be fulfilled and completed by my death and resurrection. The shadow passes away; the substance takes place: and when you eat this supper in remembrance of me, there will I be virtually present among you; and your souls shall be nourished and refreshed by my grace, as your bodies are by the bread and wine.' Bp. Porteus.—Wine is the scriptural emblem of gladness; (Notes, Judg. 9:8—15, v. 13. Ps. 104:14,15. Is. 25:6—8. 55:1—3. Zech. 9:13—17.) but Christ had done with joy and gladness, till after his resurrection: then the kingdom of his Father would be established; and his gracious presence with his true disciples, in every public or private act of worship, would fill their hearts with joy, and put new songs of praise into their mouths. In this new joy he also would share; he would "sup with them" on earth, and at length they should "sup with him" in heaven. (Notes, Is. 62:1—5, v. 5. Zeph 3:14—17. John 15:9—11. Rev. 3:20—22. 19:7—9.)

that the joy of his disciples in him, and his in them, both in the church on earth, and in the heavenly state, may be figuratively intended. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 22:14—18.)—'If you inquire, When did Christ thus drink this wine with them? I answer, he did it, not so much by "eating and drinking with his disciples after he arose from the dead, . . . as by fulfilling the promise made to them; I dispose to you a kingdom, as my Father hath done to me; . . . and ye shall eat and drink with me at my table in my kingdom:" (Luke 22:29,30.) for in what sense soever they are here said to drink with him at his table; he must also be said to drink with them.' Whitby.—Our Lord calls the wine, after consecration, "the fruit of the vine."

V. 30—35. After our Lord and the disciples had sung a hymn of praise; (Marg. and Marg. Ref. n.) according to the custom at the conclusion of the paschal supper, (which some think consisted of psalms, from the hundred and thirteenth to the hundred and eighteenth, inclusive,) he proceeded with the eleven to the mount of Olives; for Judas had previously left them (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, John 13:18—38. 14:—17:) At this time he solemnly assured them, that during that very night they would all meet with such temptations, as would stagger their faith in him, and cause them to fall into sin through fear of men; for the prophecy was about to be fulfilled, in which the Lord had declared that he would "smite the Shepherd, and the sheep should be scattered." (Note, Zech. 13:7.) They had ground, however, to be fully assured that he would rise from the dead; and then "he would go before them into Galilee." (Marg. Ref. q—t.)—But Peter, instead of noticing these last important words, with much ignorant self-confidence, (as if he had been so strong in faith above all other men, that nothing could possibly move him, and even supposing that Jesus was mistaken respecting him,) declared "that he would never be offended," even if that should be the case of all others: upon which our Lord solemnly assured him, that before the usual hour of cock-crowing that very night, and before the cock which he should hear would crow twice, he should thrice deny all knowledge of him. Peter, however, not conscious of any such intention, being honestly and warmly attached to his Lord; not aware of the treachery of his heart, the force of temptation, and the fiery trial that awaited him; and somewhat indignant at being thus suspected, confidently declared, that he would sooner die with him than deny him: in which profession he was joined by the other apostles, who were doubtless unwilling to be outdone in professions of fidelity and cordial attachment. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Notes, Mark 14:17—30, v. 30. Luke 22:31—34, v. 34. John 21:15—17, v. 15.) This unwarranted self-confidence was the first step towards Peter's shameful fall.—As John relates a similar warning and protestation, previously to the departure of Christ and the disciples from the house, some have supposed that this was a second warning, especially addressed to Peter.

V. 36—39. The word "Gethsemane" signifies the valley of fatness; and this seems to have been a pleasant and fruitful garden, to which Jesus frequently resorted with his disciples, for retirement, devout conversation, and religious exercises. When he came thither, he left the other apostles at a distance, and took with him those only as witnesses of his agony, who had before witnessed his transfiguration. (Note, 17:1,2.) In their presence "he began to be sorrowful and very heavy;" and he complained, "that his soul was exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." The words used are the most expressive imaginable, and denote the greatest dejection, amazement, anguish, and horror of mind, which can be conceived; the state of one surrounded with sorrows, overwhelmed with miseries, and almost swallowed up with consternation. In this frame of mind, he went a little way from the disciples; and first kneeling down, but afterwards prostrating himself on the earth, he prayed to his Father, that, if "possible, that cup might pass from him." Some refer this to the present anguish and horror which he felt in his soul, and not to his approaching crucifixion: but, whatever we understand by it, he expressed his strong aversion to suffering, save when the glory of God and the good of man required it; and it showed that he had all the innocent feelings of our nature, in the most exquisite degree; that, had it been "possible," that is, consistent with the justice, truth, holiness, and mercy of God, to have mitigated or remitted his sufferings, he would have desired it, as much as we should in similar circumstances: and the subsequent retraction showed his perfect resignation, and willingness to bear that unspeakable burden, which must otherwise have sunk us into everlasting destruction. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mark 14:32—46, v. 33. John 12:27—33. 18:10 —14, v. 11. Heb. 5:7—10, v. 7.) St. Luke records, that when Jesus was at prayer, an angel was sent to strengthen his mind for the conflict; and that, though the night was cold, his whole frame was agitated to such a degree, "that his sweat became as great drops of blood falling to the ground." (Note, Luke 22:39—46, vv. 43,44.)—It therefore occurs here to inquire, with diffidence and caution, into the causes of our Lord's agony. He had doubtless a distinct view of all the sufferings which he was about to undergo, with all their aggravations: but then he had all along had the same; yet, he acted and spoke with the most entire serenity, even to the very moment of this extraordinary scene. (Note, 1:2.) Many of his disciples, in different ages, have met the most excruciating tortures, which human, or rather diabolical, cruelty and ingenuity could devise, without any such perturbation; being supported by inward peace, consolation, and joyful hope: and doubtless Christ was as much superior to them all, in fortitude and constancy, as the heavens are above the earth. We must therefore conclude, that there were some ingredients mingled in his cup, which were not in theirs, and some in theirs which were not in his. (Notes, 20:20—23. Ps. 75:8.) To mention the treachery and fate of Judas, or the misconduct of Peter and the other apostles, or the unbelief of the Jews, as causes of this surprising effect, must fail to give the reflecting mind the least satisfaction.—We must also exclude many of those things, which cause the most exquisite misery to the human mind of which it is capable: for there could be in the holy Jesus no horrors of a guilty conscience, no conflict of sinful passions, no despair as to the final event of his sufferings. It is not indeed possible for us fully to understand or explain this subject: yet we may point out the light which the Scriptures afford us upon it. Christ sustained the character of our Surety, who undertook to be answerable for our sins: accordingly "our iniquities were laid upon him," and "he was made sin for us," and "suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust;" and the Scripture ascribes the heaviest of his sufferings to the immediate hand of God; "It pleased the Lord to bruise him, . . . he made his soul a sacrifice for sin." The sword of divine justice was commanded to "awake against the Shepherd, and smite him;" and God "spared not his own Son." (Notes, Is. 53:9,10. Zech. 13:7. Rom. 8:32 —34, v. 32.) From these scriptures we may conclude, that the human nature of Christ was, on this occasion, left wholly destitute of all consolatory communications from the Holy Spirit; though supported by its union with the Deity, to endure the unknown anguish without sinking under it: that he had the most distinct and clear perception of the infinite evil of sin, and of that immensity of guilt which he was to expiate: that he had the most awful view of the divine justice, and the vengeance deserved by the sins of men; and that such a sense of the divine wrath oppressed his inmost soul, as no tongue can express, or imagination conceive. At the same time "he suffered being tempted;" and, probably, all kind of horrible thoughts were suggested by Satan which tended to despondency, and every other dreadful conclusion; which would be the more intolerable, in proportion to the perfection of his holiness. (Note, Heb. 2:16—18.) So that we may be certain, he endured as much misery, of the same kind with that of condemned spirits, as could possibly consist with a pure conscience, perfect love of God and man, and an assured confidence of a glorious event. Probably, some degree of the same darkness and horror oppressed his mind, during the whole subsequent scene, till on the cross he said, "It is finished." Accordingly we do not read, that he uttered any complaint about his outward sufferings, but he most dolefully exclaimed, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" —Nor is it at all 'improbable, that this great enemy and ours, the prince of darkness, whom he came to overthrow, and with whom he maintained a constant conflict through life, and triumphed over by his death, . . . should exert his utmost power, by presenting real, or raising up imaginary terrors, to shake the constancy of his soul, and deter him from the great work he had undertaken. These, and a multitude of other agonizing distresses, unknown and inconceivable to us, which might necessarily spring from so vast, so momentous, so stupendous a work, as the salvation of a whole world, made a plain distinction between our Saviour's situation, and that of any other martyr to the cause of truth; and most clearly face, [i]and prayed, saying, [k]O my Father, [l]if it be possible, [m]let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, [n]not as I will, but as thou wilt.

40 And he cometh unto the disciples, [o]and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, [p]What, could ye not watch with me one hour?

41 [q]Watch and pray, that ye [r]enter not into temptation: [s]the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak.

42 He went away again [t]the second time, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done.

43 And he came and found them asleep again; [u]for their eyes were heavy.

44 And he left them, and went away again, and [x]prayed the third time, saying the same words.

45 Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, [y]Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, [z]the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners.

46 Rise, [a]let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me. [Practical Observations.]

47 ¶ And while he yet spake, [b]lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders of the people.

48 Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, [c]Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he; [d]hold him fast.

49 And forthwith he came to Jesus, and said, [e]Hail, Master; [f]and kissed him.

50 And Jesus said unto him, [g]Friend, wherefore art thou come? Then came they, and laid hands on Jesus, and took him.

51 And, behold, [h]one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high-priest's, and smote off his ear.

52 Then said Jesus unto him, [i]Put up again thy sword into his place: for all [k]they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.

53 Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, [l]and he shall presently give me more than [m]twelve [n]legions of angels?

54 But [o]how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?

55 In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, [p]Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and staves for to take me? [q]I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me.

56 But all this was done, [r]that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. [s]Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

V. 40, 41. Notwithstanding the confidence of Peter and his companions, and the injunctions of Christ, in his extreme anguish, that they should watch with him, they were fallen asleep when he returned; which occasioned him to rebuke Peter especially, as if surprised at him, that after all he could not "watch with him one hour!" (Note, 30—35.) He therefore exhorted them to watch and pray, not so much on his account, as on their own: lest, through negligence and presumptuous security, they should be drawn into circumstances of peculiar temptation, and overcome by it: for though, by divine grace: they were sincerely willing and ready to adhere to him, even to sufferings and death; yet "the flesh was weak" and frail, and their natural aversion to pain and shame would render them unable to stand their ground in the time of trial, if they did not seek for the powerful assistance of God to uphold and strengthen them. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 6:13. Mark 14:37,38. John 3:6. Rom. 7:18—25. 8:3—9. Gal. 5:16—18, v. 17.)—Most expositors understand the clause as a kind excuse, which the Lord made for their present conduct: but he was never used to excuse any thing wrong in them; and their sleeping on this occasion was peculiarly unseasonable and criminal. It seems therefore more proper to consider the words as a caution respecting the future; and a warning, that self-confidence and neglect of watching and prayer, would leave them defenceless in the time of danger, and that they would fall, notwithstanding their most sincere and determined resolutions to the contrary. Indeed, it is evident, that Peter's confidence in "the willingness of his spirit," and his overlooking "the weakness of the flesh," occasioned his neglect of means, induced him to thrust himself into perilous circumstances, and so made way for his awful fall.—'The words ... are not meant as an excuse, or mitigation of their sins; but as a motive to their prayer and vigilance.' Whitby.—Willing. (41) Προθυμον. Mark 14:38. Rom. 1:15.—Προθυμια. Acts 17:11. 2 Cor. 8:11,12, 19. 9:2.—Προθυμως. 1 Pet. 5:2.

V. 42—46. After this, Christ again left the disciples, and prayed nearly as before; except that he expressed more entirely his resignation to the will of the Father, in respect of his sufferings: but when he came again the second and the third time, he still found them sleeping; for their very sorrow, at what they witnessed and expected, concurred in rendering them heavy for sleep. But when he came the third time, he bade them "sleep on, and take their rest;" that is, if they were able: for, though his agonies and exhortations had failed to keep them awake, there were those coming who would do it effectually; as the "hour was at hand," when, as he had foretold, "the Son of Man," the Messiah, was to be "betrayed into the hands of sinners." V. 47—50. Judas is constantly noted as "one of the twelve;" for this was the grand aggravation of his guilt. (14)—He had made all ready for the execution of his base purpose; and, knowing the place of Christ's retirement, he led thither an armed multitude from the chief priests and rulers, who were also attended by some of the principal persons themselves. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, John 18:1—3, v. 3.)—It is probable, that our Lord had been accustomed to welcome the disciples in the most condescending and affectionate manner, by allowing them to kiss him, when they returned from any service; and Judas agreed by this token to mark him out to the officers, exhorting them to seize and hold him fast; which some think implies, that he expected Jesus would miraculously deliver himself. (Note, Mark 14:43—50, v. 44.) Accordingly, he came up with the utmost effrontery, and, with an address expressive of the highest respect and affection, he "kissed him:" but Jesus, with a meek rebuke of his complicated hypocrisy, treachery, and ingratitude, calling him "friend," or companion, as an aggravation of his guilt, demanded, why he was present on this occasion, or why he came thus attended. The officers then approached and apprehended him: and Peter, recollecting his promise, and purposing to show his readiness to fight in his Master's cause, drew a sword, and, without waiting for orders, aimed a blow at the head of the high-priest's servant, and cut off his ear; probably, he was one of the rudest and most forward in the company. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Luke 22:47—53, vv. 48,51. John 18:10—14.) But our Lord ordered Peter to put up his sword again, "as all they who took the sword would perish with the sword." This intimated to the disciples, that their warfare would be of a spiritual nature, and not waged with carnal weapons: (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) it denoted, that those who are prompt to fight, and avenge their own cause, only bring mischief and death upon themselves; and perhaps it implied, that the Jews, who now used the Roman sword against him, would soon perish by it. He further added, that he did not want their feeble help: for, if he chose to decline his sufferings, he could speedily obtain from his Father even "more than twelve legions of angels:" that is, 57 And [t]they that had laid hold on Jesus, led him away to Caiaphas the high-priest, where the scribes and the elders were assembled.

58 But Peter followed him afar off, unto the high-priest's palace, [u]and went in, and sat with the servants to see the end.

59 Now the chief priests, and elders, and all the council, [x]sought false witness against Jesus, to put him to death;

60 But [y]found none: yea, though many false witnesses came, yet found they none. [z]At the last came two false witnesses, 61 And said, [a]This fellow said, [b]I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days.

62 And the high-priest arose, and said unto him, [c]Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?

63 But [d]Jesus held his peace. And the high-priest answered and said unto him, [e]I adjure thee by the living God, [f]that thou tell us whether thou be [g]the Christ, the Son of God.

64 Jesus saith unto him, [h]Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, [i]Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on [k]the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

65 Then [l]the high-priest rent his clothes, saying, [m]He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy.

66 What think ye? They answered and said, [n]He is guilty of death.

67 Then [o]did they spit in his face, and buffeted him; [p]and others smote him with [r]the palms of their hands, 68 Saying, [q]Prophesy unto us, [r]thou Christ, Who is he that smote thee?

more angels than there were legionary soldiers in the largest Roman armies, or more than seventy thousand angels, to fight for him. (Marg. Ref. i—n.) The idea will appear most grand and sublime to those, who consider the execution made in the army of the proud Assyrian, by a single angel in one night's time. (Note, 2 Kings 19:35.) But, in this case, he inquired "how the Scriptures could be* accomplished," which predicted, that the Messiah must be cut off, and be numbered with transgressors. (Marg. Ref. o, r.) Then, addressing those who came to apprehend him, he demanded, why they came out against him with such warlike preparations, as if he had been some desperate robber, at the head of a determined gang, who could not be seized without much danger and difficulty: whereas he had daily appeared among them, as a teacher, unarmed, and unattended, except by a few fishermen, and had acted in the most peaceable manner. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Mark 14:43—50, vv. 48—50. John 18:17—23.) They had before indeed been secretly restrained from assaulting him: but now "his time was come;" and all this was ordered and performed, that the Scriptures might be exactly accomplished. When, therefore, the disciples perceived, that he intended quietly to yield himself up to the officers, their courage and resolution at once entirely failed, and they all forsook him and fled to save themselves. This conduct can by no means be excused: but thus his words were fulfilled, that they should "all be offended because of him." (Note, 30—35.)—It is remarkable, that our Lord so overawed the spirits of the assailants, that they never attempted any violence even against Peter, nor offered to apprehend any of the company. (Notes, John 18:4—9.)

V. 57—62. The grand council of the Jews was convened at the high-priest's palace, at that late hour, waiting to have Jesus brought before them; and thither the officers conducted him bound as a criminal. (Marg. Ref. t.) Peter likewise followed at some distance, to see how matters would terminate: and, having obtained admission into the high-priest's palace, he associated with the servants, as a stranger drawn thither from curiosity. (Note, John 18:15,16.) This was another false step tending to his fall. By striking the high-priest's servant, he had rendered himself obnoxious, and afraid of being detected; and seeing he had not courage openly to attend Jesus as his disciple, he ought by no means to have gone at all: for thus he thrust himself into the midst of enemies, and was forced silently to hear all their scoffs, insults, menaces, and blasphemies; and so "he entered into temptation." (Note, 40—41.)—In the mean time, the council earnestly "sought false witness" against Jesus, as conscious, that they could procure no other, and as desirous of giving their proceedings an appearance of law and justice: that so, a capital sentence having been pronounced against him by the council, they might apply to the Roman governor to have it put in execution. (Marg. Ref. x.)—'The professed entertaining of false witnesses against Christ will not seem strange, if it be remembered, that among the Jews, in actions against seducers of the people, or false prophets, it was lawful to say any thing, whether true or false, no man being permitted to say any thing in defence of them.' Hammond. This extract from the Jewish writers, shows the blindness and iniquity of their teachers to have been beyond conception great. (Notes, Ps. 35:11,12. Acts 6:9—14, vv. 11—13. 23:12—22. 24:1—9,10—21, v. 13. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)—But, while many false witnesses appeared against Jesus, the council could find no two persons agreeing in one testimony; without which the law forbade them to put any man to death. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, Deut. 17:2—7, v. 6. 19:15—21, v. 15. Mark 14:53—59, vv. 56—59.) At length two persons concurred in testifying, that he had declared himself able to destroy the temple, and to build it again in three days. The words, which our Lord had uttered long before, were widely different from this statement of them; so that their testimony was false, though it had the semblance of truth: yet even these two did not so agree, as to give any ground to a regular sentence of condemnation. (Note, John 2:18—22.) Indeed it does not appear, in what respect any thing capitally criminal could have been found in these words, had they been actually spoken.—The high-priest, however, arose from his place, in great commotion, as if some great crime had been proved; demanding, whether Jesus had nothing to say in his own behalf, when such things were witnessed against him.

V. 63—68. Our Lord remained silent before this iniquitous tribunal; not merely from perfect meekness and patience, but as our Surety, that we might have an effectual plea before the tribunal of God. The high-priest, therefore, at length solemnly "adjured him by the living God," to declare whether "he was the Christ, the Son of God," or not. This was the customary method of putting men upon their oath, to which the criminals, or witnesses, were required to answer, as in the presence of God. (Marg. Ref. d—g.) When the matter therefore was thus proposed, our Lord saw good to answer, that indeed Caiaphas had declared the real truth; and that, notwithstanding his present despised condition, they would see him, as "the Son of man, sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." This is generally interpreted of his exaltation "at the right hand of the Father," which was manifested by the "pouring out of the Spirit" on his disciples, and the vengeance executed by his power on Jerusalem: but his final coming to judgment seems also to have been intended; and the members of the council were warned, that they would at length be constrained to stand before his awful tribunal. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Dan. 7:13,14. Joel 2:28—32. Luke 22:66—71. Acts 2:33—36. Heb. 1:3,4. 8:1,2. 12:2,3. Rev. 1:7.) The avowal was evidently the very thing which the high-priest wanted: and therefore he "rent his clothes," as if in detestation of blasphemy; inquiring, what need they have to examine any more witnesses, as they all had "heard his blasphemy." In consequence therefore, they unanimously pronounced him guilty of a capital crime, and passed the sentence of death upon him; and the attendants began, by the allowance of the rulers, to insult, buffet, and spit upon him, with the greatest disdain imaginable. Having covered his eyes, they "smote him" with "the palms of their hands," or rather, "with their rods," (marg.) demanding of him a specimen and proof of his prophetical powers, by declaring the names of those who, one after another, smote him. —Thus they, without intending it, fulfilled several prophecies, the literal accomplishments of which must previously have appeared highly improbable. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Is. 50:5,6. 52:13—15, v. 14. Mic. 5:1.)

V. 69—75. Every thing which Peter had seen and heard, from his entrance into the high-priest's palace, must have tended to dismay his mind. Whilst in this situation, surrounded with terrors and dangers on every side, and doubtless assaulted by strong temptations from Satan, a young woman challenged him as being a follower of Jesus; and the dread of immediate detection, with all its imagined consequences, made him entirely forget his promises and resolutions. He was ready to fight for his Master; but he had not before thought of the ignominious death of a criminal: he was therefore surprised into a denial of Christ, and a declaration, that he knew not what the woman meant by such an assertion. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Mark 14:66—72, vv. 67,68. John 18:17—23, vv. 17,18.) When he was gone out into the porch, or portico, belonging to the palace, perhaps with some thoughts of departing, another maid saw him, and said to those around her, that he certainly had been an attendant of Jesus: accordingly they charged him with it; (Marg. Ref. x, a. Note, Luke 22:54—62, v. 58.) and he again denied it, declaring with an oath that he did not so much as know him. This, probably, prevented him from attempting to go away, though we learn from Mark, that the cock at this time crowed: and in consequence, after another hour, those who stood by came to him, with a relation of Malchus whose ear he had cut off, and with greater confidence declared, that he assuredly was one of them; for they had seen him with Jesus in the garden, and his Galilean dialect betrayed him as one of his followers. But Peter, now filled with extreme terror, "began to curse and to swear," or to anathematize himself, as accursed of God and devoted to utter destruction, if he so much as knew the man! While he was using this horrid language, the cock again crowed; and Jesus, being come into sight, turned and "looked upon him." Thus he was at once brought to recollect the words of Jesus, and his own rash engagements. His whole guilt immediately rushed into his mind; he without delay left the place, full of the deepest shame, anguish, and remorse, and "wept bitterly" at the remembrance of his profaneness, treachery, cowardice, and ingratitude. (Marg. Ref. b—h. Notes, Mark 14:66—72, v. 72. Luke 22:54—62, v. 61.)—Peter was left thus to fall, in order to give him a deeper acquaintance with his own heart, to abate his self-confidence, and to render him more modest, humble, and compassionate; and his whole subsequent conduct showed, that he had exceedingly profited by the painful lesson. The event has also proved most instructive in various ways to believers ever since; and if infidels, Pharisees, and hypocrites will stumble at it, or abuse it, they do it at their peril. (Note, 2 Sam. 11:27. P. O. 14—27.)—'Peter, by the wonderful providence of God, appointed to be a witness of all these things, is prepared to be the example of singular constancy, by the experience of his own incredulity.' Beza.—'I venture to say, that it is useful to proud men to fall into some open and manifest sin, that they may be displeased with themselves, as they had already fallen by their self-complacence. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Amidst the apparently confused, casual, and distressing events, which take place in the world, through the treachery, avarice, ambition, or impiety of mankind; we should always advert to the "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," as bounding, directing, and overruling all, for the purposes of his own glory, and the benefit of those who trust in him. "There are many devices in the heart of man;" and ungodly politicians form their plans with profound sagacity, and conceal them with deep dissimulation: yet, contrary to their intentions, they are led to arrange or alter them, in subserviency to the secret counsel of the Lord!—The enmity of the carnal heart against the law, truth, and image of God, is irreconcilable and mortal: it rages with greater violence in hypocrites, than in other men; but most of all in covetous and ambitious churchmen. Thus power and policy have, in every age, combined against the Person and cause of Jesus; yet they have not been able to prevail against them. But there has always been a remnant of another character: these are humble, penitent, and believing they reverence and love the Redeemer's Person and character: they deem themselves to be under infinite obligations to him; they long to express their love and gratitude, and zeal for his glory; and they count nothing too valuable to be renounced for his sake, or employed in his service. These principles operate differently, as circumstances vary; but they always produce such actions, as honour Christ, and as he will accept and commend: for he judges of men's conduct by their motives, and will not reject a well-meant service, springing from humble faith and love, though it may appear to us informal. But covetous hypocrites are ready to exclaim, "To what purpose is this waste?" When they see others liberal in honouring Christ, even the fraudulent and unjust will plead for charity, if they can thus discredit the pious effusions of a believer's fervent love: and too often their plausible pretences seduce injudicious, or less zealous disciples, to censure those services which Christ accepts. But he will plead the cause of his humble followers; and rebuke those, who trouble them for their good works, which they have "wrought for his name's sake." It is his plan, that there should, in every age and place, be poor persons, and poor Christians as his stated representatives, in order to make trial of the faith and love of his disciples; that whenever they will, they may relieve them for his sake. This is the ordinary method; but extraordinary expressions of our love and gratitude are sometimes proper; and these will not be found inconsistent with each other, or materially to interfere with one another.

V. 14—25. Upright persons, when betrayed into a mistake, will take reproof in good part; but it often proves the detection of hypocrites: thus the discovery of their secret motives, and the commendation of those whom they dislike, or the actions which they disapprove, exasperate them, and push them forward to still baser attempts: and while those whom they censured are had in perpetual and honourable remembrance, themselves sink into final infamy and misery.—But with what scrupulous care and vigilance should every one guard against the first workings of avarice, and shun the most minute deviations from strict equity! For when dishonesty, in comparatively little things, has rendered the conscience callous, and given energy to temptation, men become capable of the most shameless injustice without hesitation; and the common question is, "What will ye give me?" Then the most endeared or sacred ties will be broken, for even paltry filthy lucre, by men who set their consciences and their souls to sale. And by these means, scheming villains, who were at a loss how to accomplish their intended iniquities, are furnished with instruments as detestable as themselves; and they mutually assist, and yet abhor and despise, each other.—But let us follow the steps of our divine Master, whatever man may devise against us. His disciples may inquire when, where, and with what preparation he would have them to attend on his institutions: but they should take it for granted, that he will not countenance neglect in any; as he himself attended on all which were then in force.—Every heart is in his hands: he knows those "hidden ones" who favour his cause, and will graciously visit all who are willing to receive him: and he will take care to procure from them entertainment for his disciples also.—But divine ordinances are seldom administered, even to a few persons, without the intrusion of some hypocrite: and the cause of Christ is often most betrayed by some of those, who seem most entirely to belong to him. This consideration may often make us "exceedingly sorrowful;" and it should always render us very diligent in self-examination.—When a few persons are met for social prayer, religious conversation, or at the Lord's table; it may probably occur to each of them to suppose, that their heart-searching Saviour is saying to the company, "Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me." They should not, however, look around on others with suspicion; but with self-examination and prayer should say, "Lord, is it I?" We ought to be the more earnest in this investigation, because the doom of such domestic enemies will be most dreadful; so that it may be said of them especially, that "it would have been good for them, if they had never been born:" and what heart can conceive the awful and tremendous import of those words! (Note, Ps. 90:11.)

V. 26—35. Self-examination and fervent prayers are peculiarly proper before "the Lord's supper" in order that, as 75 And Peter [f]remembered the word of Jesus, which said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. [h]And he went out, and wept bitterly.

f 34. Luke 22:61,62. John 13:38. h 27:3—5. Luke 22:32. Rom. 7:13—20.

"Christ our Passover is now sacrificed for us," we may "keep this" commemorative "feast, not with the old leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth;" and that we may, every time we partake of it, renew our repentance, our faith in his blood, our consent to his covenant, our lively exercise of admiring grateful love to him, and love to his people, and our surrender of ourselves to his service, as "bought with a price to glorify him with our bodies and our spirits, which are his." While we contemplate the outward signs of "his body broken and his blood shed for the remission of our sins;" let us recollect, that the feast was as expensive to him, as if he had literally "given us his flesh to eat, and his blood to drink;" that there must be a real (though a spiritual) participation of him, and appropriation of his salvation to our souls, or else we shall have no benefit from his sacrifice; and that by a continued reliance on him, in lively faith, we must be strengthened and recruited for our conflict, our work, and "the race that is set before us." Let no humble believer then neglect the obedience of faith and love, in respect to this command of his dying Saviour; as safety and comfort should be sought in the way of his precepts. Whilst multitudes profane this sacred ordinance, by a proud, pharisaical, infidel, or licentious attendance; and numbers, by statedly absenting themselves, confess their consciousness that they have no part or lot in the blessings of salvation; even many true Christians are guilty of ingratitude and hard suspicions of the gracious Redeemer, and do great harm to their own souls, by refusing this profession of their faith and love, or by so seldom joining with his people in thus remembering him. It may be apprehended that some are alarmed by the case and doom of Judas, and the conscious hypocrite may well be called upon to pause and tremble at the thought: but the feeble Christian should remember, that all the apostles were offended during that very night, in which they had eaten both the passover and the Lord's supper, and that Peter fell in a more dreadful manner; yet their guilt was not unpardonable, nor their fall irrecoverable. Our communicating indeed ought to excite us to redouble our watchfulness: but the fear of afterwards being overcome by temptation, should never induce any man to neglect obedience to the express command of Christ. Rather we should seek in this affecting ordinance, to enjoy his "love, which is better than wine;" (Notes, Cant. 1:2,4.) and to anticipate the felicity of heaven, when we shall rejoice with the Saviour, and he with us, unspeakably and eternally.

V. 36—46. While we with thankfulness take the cup of salvation, let us never forget that cup of wrath, which the Redeemer drank off to the very dregs, for the remission of our sins. If we were not shamefully and surprisingly drowsy in spiritual things, we never could read or meditate about Gethsemane, without the most lively affections, and most instructive recollections. Here let us look attentively, that we may learn to distinguish between the sufferings of a martyr, and those of our atoning Sacrifice. View a poor, frail, sinful man, under the smiles of his reconciled Father, serene and cheerful in the prospect and endurance of every possible torture: then behold the incarnate Son of God, "the holy, undefiled," "well beloved" of the Father, "in whom he was well pleased," prostrate on the earth, "exceedingly sorrowful even unto death," and "sweating great drops of blood, rolling to the ground;" and with this scene before our eyes, let it be determined, whether he was not then enduring the wrath and tremendous frown of God, as our Surety and the vicarious Sacrifice for our sins. And let the careless and impenitent ask themselves, Did God's own hand inflict these insupportable strokes, in fulfilment of his ancient prophecies, on his "beloved Son," who was more valued by him than the whole visible creation, and will he break his word, in order to spare a determined rebel and enemy, who takes encouragement to sin from the very persuasion of God being merciful? Most vain and destructive presumption! (Note, Deut. 29:19,20.) Did the load of imputed guilt so weigh down the soul of him concerning whom it is said, that "He upholdeth all things by the word of his power?" Into what an abyss of misery unknown then must they sink, whose iniquities are left upon their own heads, a burden far "too heavy for them to bear!" "How will they escape who neglect so great salvation?" What a forlorn hope must that of the Pharisee or the infidel be, who expects happiness in his own way, despising that which infinite wisdom has devised, and infinite love effected, at a price which baffles the powers of computation itself! Assuredly it will end in black despair; with the presumption of every one, who perverts the doctrine of a free salvation, as an excuse for indulged wickedness.—But the same scene discovers a cheerful dawn of hope to the trembling, desponding penitent: here we see the infinite hatred of sin of our holy Lord God, and his infinite love of sinners; his determination to satisfy his justice, and his delight in exercising mercy. In short, we must resort to Gethsemane, to learn repentance, hatred of sin, humility, hope, love, patience, meekness, and self-denying obedience; and to find comfort under dejection and temptations. Here we see our pattern, our motives, our encouragements; here we learn the vanity of the world, the evil of sin, and our obligations to live devoted to him, and willingly to suffer for his glory, who agonized and died for our salvation. While here we abide, we should beware of drowsiness: when "our souls are sorrowful," we should pour them out in prayer; and when nature would shrink from suffering, and would say, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me," we should learn to add, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." We should also remember, that even our merciful High-Priest will "rebuke those whom he loves:" and if we promise great things, and come evidently short in little things; he will as it were, say to us, "What! could ye not watch with me one hour?" We must all indeed be tempted: yet we should be exceedingly afraid of "entering into temptation," by being drawn into such circumstances, as give our enemies an opportunity of coming specially near to us, and obtaining their advantage against us. To be secured from this, we should watch and pray without ceasing: for though, in the regenerate, "the spirit is willing" for service or suffering; yet we carry about with us the remains of a carnal mind, our "hearts are deceitful above all things," we are "weak through the flesh," and should continually be looking to the Lord, to "hold us up that we may be safe." But, after repeated warnings and rebukes, how dull and inattentive do we often remain! This causes our compassionate Lord to employ other means and instruments, to rouse us from our fatal lethargy; and when sharp afflictions or persecutions come upon us, he will, as it were, say to us, "Sleep on now, and take your rest," if you are able: yet, if even then we arise and follow him, he will preserve us from all permanent or fatal evil.

V. 47—56. While we contemplate the insolence and enmity of those who assaulted the Prince of Peace, and above all the treachery of Judas, with abhorrence: let us not forget that such are we by nature, and so should we have acted, if left to ourselves. No enemies, however, deserve such decided execration, as those professed disciples, who "betray Christ with a kiss."—It behooves us assiduously to copy the meekness and patience of Christ; and very circumspectly to avoid the rashness and cowardice of Peter, and the other apostles. Whatever provocations we meet with from avowed adversaries or false friends, or however we may be tried by the infirmities of inconsistent believers; we should learn of Jesus to "possess our souls in patience," and to use no weapons, except sound arguments, mild expostulations, kind actions, and fervent prayers. Thus we shall be kept in peace; whilst "they who take the sword will perish by the sword."—If it should be necessary for us, the prevalent intercession of our heavenly Advocate will procure for us the protection of "legions of angels:" but when our appointed time is come, we must be removed from this present world; yet the "Scriptures must needs be fulfilled" in us also, and all the promises belong to every believer in Christ, and shall assuredly be fulfilled in everlasting glory and felicity.

V. 57—68. Happy are they against whom their most malicious enemies can allege nothing, except by "false witnesses!"—Persecutors will indeed commonly be more assiduous in doing mischief, than the most diligent Christian in doing good; and they will be sometimes watching to execute their wicked purposes, even when he is neglecting to watch and pray: they will find false witnesses, and invent slanders, to give a colour to their cruel hatred; and pervert the words of those who plead the cause of God, to a quite contrary meaning: by these methods Jesus has been persecuted in his followers in every age. But while such men profess to execrate the imagined crimes of those whom they condemn; their own consciences often protest against the sentence, and they feel that their proceedings are iniquitous. How then will they abide the coming of the Judge, when they shall "see him at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven?" Let those, therefore, who have the honour to "suffer for his sake," contemplate his calm behaviour before the council, and his intrepid confession of his true character; and let them consider the crimes alleged against him, the condemnation passed on him, and the contempt, indignity, and insult which he most patiently and meekly endured. For the Christian cannot reasonably expect so much tenderness and compassion, when suffering for the truth, as a thief or murderer might, when punished for his crimes! and if he look to the scene which we are considering, he will perceive, that disdain, cruel mockings, and every expression of abhorrence, are the sure portion of the true disciple, from such men as spat in the face of the holy Jesus, and buffeted and derided the "Lord of glory." Yet let us boldly confess his name, and bear the reproach; and he will confess us before his Father's throne: whilst those who pretend to do service to God, by murdering his saints, will be covered with shame and everlasting contempt.

V. 69—75. Let all beware of vain-confidence and self-preference. It does not become us to boast, or resolve what we will do: rather let us decline temptation as much as we can, and trust in the Lord alone to uphold us. Let us also avoid rashness, and pray for victory over the fear of man. In all these respects, we need much forbearance from our gracious Lord: though we be not traitors, we are prone to decline the cross; though we do follow Christ, it is commonly at a great distance; and it is not unusual for even his disciples to be afraid of being known to belong to him! But when self-confidence induces men to thrust themselves uncalled into perilous circumstances, we may expect to hear of lamentable consequences.—Little do we know how we should act in very difficult situations, if left to ourselves: the snow does not more naturally melt before the fire, than our resolutions vanish when we enter into temptation. Who then can say what he will do, or what he will not do? The way of sin is also downhill; every step makes way for another still more fatal; and there is nothing so false, impious, or atrocious, to which we might not gradually be tempted, if the Lord should wholly leave us. "Let him therefore, that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," and let us all distrust our own hearts, and rely wholly on God, according to his word.—Let it also be noted, that Peter first lied wilfully: then he committed the most direct perjury to cover his lie: and then he uttered the most horrid execration on himself, equivalent to the worst language of those who delight in cursing. This is the common progress of men in such cases. He who ventures on a lie, will almost always, if pressed to it, call God to witness the truth of it; and, if still further urged, will wish all manner of evil on himself, if he does not speak truth.—If any have fallen even in the most dreadful manner, let them think of Peter's recovery, and not despair; and let them recollect the words of Christ, as well as their own sins; that their tears, confessions, and humiliations may be mingled with hope. And let us all frequently remember our past follies, and manifold instances of ingratitude; that we may learn watchfulness, humility, caution, and compassion for the tempted and fallen, by the experience of our own numerous mistakes, sins, and recoveries.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVII. V. 1, 2. The night must have been far advanced, before the transactions recorded in the foregoing chapter were finished: and it was early in the morning when the chief priests and elders "delivered up" Jesus "to the governor." It is not certain whether they adjourned for a while, or continued together all night. If they had not "taken counsel against him to put him to death," they would not have had occasion to apply to Pilate; for they had still the power of executing lighter punishments: but they were not allowed to inflict death, without the consent of the Roman governor. Perhaps they were the more willing to deliver Jesus up to him, because the Roman punishment of crucifixion was more ignominious and excruciating, than stoning. They therefore bound Jesus, (having probably loosed him during his examination; or they confined him more closely than before, as a condemned malefactor,) and delivered him up to Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator of Judea, in order that he might be put to death by his authority. —'To ensure success in that quarter, it was necessary to give their accusations against Jesus such a colour and shape, as should prevail upon the governor to put him to death. ... They had condemned him for blasphemy: but this they knew would have little weight with a pagan, ... who, like Gallio, would "care for none of these things." ... They therefore resolved to bring him before Pilate as a state-prisoner, and to charge him with treasonable and seditious practices.' Bp. Porteus. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mark 15:1—5.) —To put ... to death. (1) Θανατωσαι. 10:21. Rom. 8:13.

V. 3—5. Whatever Judas's views and expectations had been, when he betrayed his Lord, he saw his own conduct in a very different light, when he found that Jesus was condemned to die, and was about to be crucified as a malefactor and a slave. (Note, 26:14—16.) Then "he repented himself;" yet not with genuine humiliation and godly sorrow, united with faith, hope and love: but he was sorry that he had committed this one crime; his conscience was filled with horror and remorse, and his heart with anguish and terror. He could not but be sensible of the excellency and holiness of the character of Jesus; probably he was convinced that he was the promised Messiah; the miracles which he had witnessed, and the miraculous powers which he had received, must occur to his memory; and the wisdom, condescension and love of his Lord, together with his peculiar kindness to him, must on this occasion rush at once on his recollection. Thus being left by God, Satan, who before had tempted him to presumption, now urged him to despair. Yet, before his last fatal determination, perhaps hoping to obtain a reversal of Christ's condemnation, he went to the chief priests and elders, to return "the wages of his iniquity." They were at that time in the precincts of the temple; whether they held their council there, and had not yet delivered up Jesus to Pilate; or whether they had gone thither after he was delivered up to be crucified, in order to perform some hypocritical task of devotion. In their presence, however, Judas acknowledged that "he had sinned," (Marg. Ref. g. Note, Ex. 10:16,17. 1 Sam. 15:24,25,30,31.) in that he had betrayed an innocent person into their hands, who was by that means likely to be put to death; and he was now fully sensible, that his conduct had been peculiarly base and criminal. This was a most honourable testimony to Christ's character: but though this crime lay with intolerable weight on the conscience of Judas, and he confessed it to man, and dared not to keep the infamous wages of his crime; yet it does not appear that he was at all sensible of the guilt of his hypocrisy, and covetousness, and thefts, and all the other wickedness, committed during the whole course of his past life. The rulers, however, were too malignant and hardened, to be any ways affected by this interesting circumstance; and they coldly declared, that the opinion and conduct of so base a wretch concerned not them; let him look to that himself, for they were determined to put Jesus to death. 'Could they think it no sin, to hire a man "to betray innocent blood?" Do not they confess this money to be "the price of blood?" (6) And was it not the very money they gave to purchase that blood? And was not the field they bought with it, styled, upon this account, "The field of blood?" And was not this a lasting testimony of their guilt, whose money purchased this blood? And therefore Stephen roundly calls them οἱ προδόται, the betrayers and murderers of that Just One. Acts 7:52.' Whitby. This answer of the elders and chief priests completed Judas's despair; and, casting down the money, "he departed, and went and hanged himself." It seems evident that he was his own executioner, by strangling himself; and this account may be reconciled with that of Peter, as recorded in the Acts, by supposing that he suspended himself, in such a place and manner, that the rope, or wood to which it was fastened, brake; and that he fell from a great height, and so burst asunder; this coming to pass by the special purpose of God, to render his body a more terrible spectacle to all beholders, and to cause his death to be the more remarked. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Note, Acts 1:16—18.) It admits of little doubt, that Judas's death preceded that of his injured Lord: so speedily did divine vengeance overtake him. Yet the rulers took no notice even of this alarming circumstance!—'It appears to me that the acquittal or condemnation of Jesus never entered into Judas's contemplation. ... All he thought of was gain. He had kept the common purse, and had robbed it: and his only object was to obtain a sum of money, which he determined to have at all events, and left consequences to take care of themselves. But when he saw that his divine Master, whom he knew to be perfectly innocent, was actually condemned to death, his conscience then flew in his face, his guilt rose up before him in all its horrors: ... he could no longer bear the agonizing tortures that racked his soul, but went immediately and destroyed himself. ... The answer of the chief priests ... was perfectly natural for men of that character. ... Men who had any feeling, any sentiments of common humanity, or even of common justice, ... would have put an immediate stop to the proceedings. ... But this was far from entering into their plan. ... All they wanted, was the destruction of a man whom they hated and feared; and whose life and doctrine was a standing reproach to them. ... And yet, to see the astonishing inconsistence of human nature, and the strange contrivances, by which the most abandoned of men endeavour to satisfy their minds; ... these very men ... had wonderful qualms of conscience, about putting into the treasury the money which they themselves had given as "the price of blood."—Judas was the constant companion of our Saviour's ministry, and witness to every thing he said or did. If there had been any plan concerted to impose a false religion on the world, ... Judas must have been in the secret. ... Porteus.* 'The greatest enemy, with a choice of means for detection of fraud and collusion, could not have pointed out any thing better calculated to suit his purpose, than the placing of Judas among the apostles.—It was a remarkable provision made by the Lord, for increasing to the highest point the value of the testimony of the twelve apostles. It was like the water which Elijah commanded to be poured around the altar, before the fire from heaven descended to consume the sacrifice. Judas also, as the other apostles, although in a different way, sealed his testimony with his blood.' Haldane on Divine Revelation.

V. 6—10. When the priests and rulers had leisure, with a scrupulosity worthy of their character, they consulted what was to be done with the money restored by Judas, and determined that it was unlawful to put it into the sacred treasury; having been the price paid for the blood of Jesus, and proving eventually that of Judas also. (Note, 23:23,24.) Yet they thought it proper to lay it out in some way, which might appear charitable: and therefore they purchased with it a piece of waste ground, which had been dug up for clay by a potter, and was of small value; that it might be appropriated to the burial of such persons of other nations as died at Jerusalem; on which account that field was called "the field of blood," even to the time when Matthew wrote his gospel. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Note, Acts 1:19.) This fulfilled an ancient prophecy, which is here said to have been spoken by Jeremiah, but which we have already considered in the prophecy of Zechariah. (Note, Zech. 11:10—14.)—Various conjectures have been formed on the subject: but it is most natural to admit that a trivial error has crept into the text; for the change of a single letter, according to the abbreviated manner in which names are written in the old manuscripts, would suffice to occasion the mistake. The passage is quoted something differently than it stands in the prophecy: but the meaning is, that the thirty shekels, the vile price at which the Jews valued and bargained for the Shepherd of Israel, as if he had been a slave, came into the hands of a potter. This was foretold and exactly accomplished. If this be, as it is by far most probable, intended as a quotation from Zechariah, or a reference to his prediction; the Septuagint must have been wholly disregarded by the Evangelist. This version may be literally translated as follows: 'They appointed thirty pieces of silver as my hire; and the Lord said unto me, Place these in the refiner's furnace, and I will see whether it be approved, in the manner in which I have been proved by them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and I brought them into the house of the Lord, unto the refiner's furnace.'—It accords much more nearly, though not exactly, to the Hebrew.—The treasury. (6) Κορβανας.—Κορβαν. Note, Mark 7:11,12.

V. 11—18. 'Little did the governor imagine who it was that then stood before him! Little did he suspect, that he himself must one day stand before the tribunal of that very person, whom he was then about to judge as a criminal!' Bp. Porteus.—The rulers of the Jews, knowing how jealous the Romans were of their authority, accused Jesus o. advancing claims to the kingdom. Pilate therefore "asked him," saying, "Art thou the king of the Jews," to which he answered in the affirmative: yet, as Pilate had doubtless heard of the inoffensive demeanour of Jesus and his few followers, he probably thought his pretensions more worthy of derision than opposition. His prosecutors, therefore, fearing that they should not carry their point, were earnest in laying many things to his charge; which only convinced Pilate that they envied his authority and reputation among the people, as eclipsing their own. Yet when Pilate inquired whether Jesus had any thing to say in answer to all these accusations, he remained silent! He had no guilt to confess; yet he would not exculpate himself: for he submitted to condemnation, that he might die as a sacrifice for our sins. This silence, which doubtless was distinguished by a mild and sedate dignity of aspect, the reverse of the sullenness of an obstinate criminal, astonished Pilate. He believed Jesus to be perfectly innocent; and yet he would use neither arguments nor entreaties, to rescue himself from that terrible death with which he was threatened! The Romans allowed accused persons to answer for themselves. The apostle Paul frequently availed himself of this, and made his defence. (Notes, Acts 24:10—21. 25:15—27:26.) Jesus, long accustomed to speak in public, could not be considered as incapable of pleading his own cause. Pilate was therefore exceedingly amazed to find that he would not avail himself of the opportunity. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Notes, Mark 15:1—5. Luke 23:1—5. John 18:33—36. 19:8—12 1 Tim. 6:13—15, v. 13.) Pilate was, however, still desirous of releasing him: and as it had become a custom to pardon some condemned Jew, at the feast of the passover, to please the people; he supposed that this custom would give him the occasion of releasing him; for he concluded that the multitude in some degree favoured him: so that, when they required him to indulge them as usual, he proposed none but Jesus and Barabbas. And as Barabbas was a noted criminal, who had been guilty of murder as well as robbery, Pilate doubtless concluded that they would unanimously prefer Jesus to him. (*Marg. V. 19—23. While these things were in agitation, another circumstance occurred, which increased Pilate's perplexity, and his desire to save Jesus: for his wife sent to caution him by no means to have any hand in the death of "that righteous man," whom he was solicited to condemn; as she had endured much misery by terrifying dreams respecting him; which made her conclude that his death would be avenged in an awful manner upon all concerned in it. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) In the mean time, the rulers were using all their influence with the people, to induce them to demand the release of Barabbas, and the crucifixion of Jesus: and when Pilate renewed his proposal, he was surprised to find that Barabbas was unanimously preferred; and that the multitude were clamorous in demanding the crucifixion of Jesus, whom they had called the Messiah, though they could lay no crime to his charge. On other occasions, the condemnation of any Jew, who was not a slave, to this ignominious and cruel death, would have hazarded an insurrection: but the people had been disappointed in their expectations of a temporal kingdom; and many of them seem to have thought that a Messiah of Jesus's character was worthy only of contempt and crucifixion.—It has, however, often excited wonder, that the multitude, who, but a short time before had welcomed him with loud Hosannas, as the "Son of David!" and "the King of Israel," (Note, 21: 8—11.) and who so much favoured his cause, as to render the rulers afraid of openly proceeding against him, should all at once be induced to demand his crucifixion with irresistible vehemence. But a multitude hastily collected is a fluctuating body; and resembles the waters of the sea, which yield to the least impulse of the wind.—Many, who before led the people and favoured the cause of Christ, intimidated by late events, had no doubt retired: others were disappointed because he would not assume temporal dominion, and raise an army to liberate them from the Romans; and several persons who had been driven away by the popular torrent in his favour, when he entered Jerusalem, no doubt at this time came forward, attended by emissaries from the scribes and priests. And those who remember, that in every multitude thus collected, "the most part know not wherefore they are come together," will readily perceive that a small company of considerable persons, (a hundred out of ten thousand,) eager on the contrary part, and skilful in exciting men's passions and prejudices, would soon give a new direction to the populace; and that the change, from Hosanna to Crucify, was not materially different from other changes, which varying circumstances have made in large companies promiscuously assembled. (Marg. Ref. g, l. Note, Acts 19:23—31.)

V. 24, 25. Pilate was very reluctant to condemn Jesus to be crucified: but the Jews were so bent upon it, that he concluded it would be hazardous to stand out against them; lest they should excite an insurrection, or accuse him to the emperor as disaffected to his authority. His government was also very odious to the Jews, and he was afraid of exasperating them. (Note, John 19:8—12, v. 12.) But his struggle, on this occasion, shows the power of conscience in the worst of men; and the horror, which it often feels, (till inured to it,) of wilful deliberate murder.—The whole process resembled the examination of a sacrifice, that it might be proved to be without blemish, far more than the trial of a criminal for condemnation: and it is unprecedented in the annals of mankind, for a person condemned to so dreadful a death, to have been at the very time pronounced "innocent," or righteous, by the person who conducted those that apprehended him, (3) by the judge who passed sentence on him, and at length by the very officer who superintended his execution, (54) whilst they who clamorously demanded his death could allege no reason for their conduct. No doubt God providentially ordered all these circumstances, to make it evident, that Jesus suffered for no fault of his own, but merely for the sins of his people.—When, however, Pilate had determined to yield to the desire of the Jews; as a relief to his conscience, and a protestation against their injustice, "he took water, and washed his hands before them." This was probably a custom among the Romans, as well as the Jews, in averring their innocence of any crime charged on them. (Marg. Ref. m. Note, Deut. 21:1—9, vv. 6—9.) It was a most explicit testimony to Christ's innocency of the crimes charged on him: for Pilate could intend no more, though his words, compared with the reality of the case, may seem to imply that his death would be required of the Jews as his murderers: but it was vain for Pilate to expect thus to free himself from the guilt of "the innocent blood" of "a righteous person;" when he was bound by office to protect him from his cruel enemies. The Jews, however, were more callous than the heathen governor: and while he feebly attempted to clear himself of the guilt, they, by a most horrid imprecation, willingly took it all upon themselves and their posterity! This imprecation has been most awfully answered: as they were willing to bear the guilt of the blood, which they were about to shed; so it actually was avenged on them in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, when vast numbers were crucified; and doubtless some of these very persons, as well as of their children: and the nation has ever since been exposed to incessant injuries from man, and left as an anathema from God; as still, from age to age, persisting in the sin of their fathers, and justifying it, as the deserved punishment of a deceiver.—"They put Jesus to death, when the nation was assembled to celebrate the passover; and when the nation was assembled for the same purpose, Titus shut them up within the walls of Jerusalem. The rejection of the true Messiah was their crime: and the following of false Messiahs to their destruction was their punishment. They bought Jesus as a slave, and they themselves were afterwards sold and bought as slaves, at the lowest prices. . . . They put Jesus to death, lest the Romans "should come, and take away their place and nation;" and the Romans did come, and take away their place and nation. And, what is still more striking, and still more strongly marks the judgment of God upon them; they were punished with that very kind of death, which they were so eager to inflict on the Saviour of mankind, the death of the cross; and that in such prodigious numbers, that Josephus assures us, there wanted wood for crosses, and room to place them in." Bp. Porteus. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—See ye to it. (24) Ὑμεῖς ὄψεσθε. 4.

V. 26—31. Barabbas escaped, in consequence of Jesus's condemnation. He deserved death, but was preserved, and the righteous and holy Saviour suffered in his stead. This accords, as to the grand outline, with the method of a sinner's salvation, through the sufferings of Christ.—The Jewish rulers, by using their influence in preserving a murderer from death, took an effectual method of bringing the vengeance of God on the land; though not so effectual, as by crucifying the Son of God. (Notes, 11—18, vv. 16,17. Num. 35:31—34. Mark 15:6—10, v. 7. Luke 23:21—25, v. 25.)—St. John expressly mentions Christ's being scourged and crowned with thorns, before Pilate finally passed sentence on him: it is therefore conjectured, that he had been scourged some time before, by orders from Pilate, in hopes that this disgrace and torture would have appeased the rage of the multitude, or softened them into compassion, and so have made way for his release. It is well known that the Romans used to scourge malefactors, just before they were crucified; "as if the exquisite tortures of crucifixion were not sufficient, without adding to them those of the scourge!" Bp. Porteus. Possibly, the scourging might be twice repeated; but it is more probable, that Matthew and Mark introduce this account, not in the exact order of time in which it occurred. It is at least evident, that Pilate made an effort to save Jesus, after he had been scourged, and crowned with thorns: and perhaps the soldiers, after sentence was finally passed, carried still further the indignities which they had before commenced. (Marg. Ref. r. John 19:1—7.)—But, in whatever order these events occurred, the blessed Jesus was at length delivered up, without reserve, to the insults, derision, and cruelty of the soldiers; who, collecting the whole cohort into the pretorium, clothed him with "a scarlet" or purple robe, (perhaps a purple vestment with a scarlet robe over it,) such as used to be worn by the Roman generals, being probably one that Pilate had cast off. Thus, they arrayed him in the garments of royalty, as indignantly scorning his claim to be the "King of the Jews:" and then mingling cruelty with contempt, they plaited thorns into a crown for his head, and put a reed, or cane, such as was used to walk with, into his hand instead of a sceptre. Then they bowed their knee in mockery: and at the same time they spit upon him, and smote the thorns into his temples, by taking the cane and striking him with it upon the head. (Marg. and *Marg. See on Note, 26:63—68, v. 67. Notes, Mark 15:11,20, vv. 18,19,20, Luke 23:6—12, v. 11.)—We may form some conception of this scene, if we consider the ferocity, haughtiness, and impiety of the idolatrous Roman soldiers; and how they were let loose on the mild and holy Jesus, to give full scope to their savage and cruel contempt, and to divert themselves with his sufferings, till they were even weary of mocking him. When this at length was the case, they took off from him the insignia of royalty; and, putting on him his own garments, those who were appointed to be his executioners led him away to crucify him. Had he suffered as a murderer, they would not have thus insulted him; but would have in some measure pitied his anguish, whilst they executed the sentence of the law upon him.—Another meaning has been sought out for the word rendered thorns, as if bearsfoot, or some inoffensive vegetable, was intended. This criticism, however, has been proved, by the most competent scholars, wholly untenable. But why should the peculiar weed, or plant, of which the contemptuous crown was made, be especially noted, if this had not been a circumstance particularly marking the cruelty of our Lord's enemies, and the variety and intenseness of his sufferings?

V. 32—34. 'Jesus is led out of the city, that we may be brought into the heavenly kingdom. He found no comfort any where, that we might be filled with all comforts. He is made a curse, that we may be blessed. He is spoiled of his garments, that we might be enriched by his nakedness.' Beza.—It was customary for the persons who were sentenced to crucifixion, to carry their crosses, or at least a heavy part of them, to the place where they were crucified. But Jesus had been so harassed by multiplied fatigues and miseries, that probably he appeared almost exhausted: so that the persons employed might fear lest he should die under the burden, and escape their further cruelties, if they compelled him to bear the cross all the way to Golgotha. It seems at first to have been laid upon him; but afterwards meeting with Simon, a native of Cyrene, who evidently was suspected of favouring him, they obliged him to bear the cross after Jesus. Perhaps he bare the whole the rest of the way; or he carried one end, while Jesus, going before, carried the other. This aptly represented the believer's conformity to his Lord, in bearing the cross, even the scorn and hatred of the world. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, 16:24—28, v. 24.) In this manner, they proceeded to a place without the city, called "Golgotha," or "a place of a skull:" being, probably, so called from the skulls and human bones, which were there in abundance; as it had long been the place of execution and burial for malefactors. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, Luke 23:32—38, v. 33.)—It was customary to give those, who were about to suffer this lingering and most painful death, a potion to benumb their feelings, composed of wine mingled with myrrh or spices: and some compassionate persons seem to have prepared this cordial, which they offered to Jesus; but he would not taste it, as his purpose was to suffer death in all its bitterness. But others, full of contempt and malignity, had mingled "vinegar with gall," to render it most nauseous, and offered it to him instead of the spiced wine, which, having tasted, he refused to drink: and thus an ancient prophecy of the Messiah was literally fulfilled. (Note, Ps. 69:21.)—Those learned men, who labour to prove, that "the vinegar mingled with gall" was in fact the same as "the wine mingled with myrrh," mentioned by St. Mark, seem to have forgotten this remarkable prophecy. (Marg. Ref. e. Note, Mark 15:21—24, v. 23.)—They compelled. (32) Ηγγαρευσαν. See on 5:41.

V. 35. The soldiers next proceeded to crucify Jesus. This was performed in the following manner: the sufferer was stripped almost naked, and extended on the wood of the cross, as it lay on the ground; his arms were then stretched out on the transverse beam, and fastened to it by spikes driven through the hands; and the feet were fastened to the upright part of the cross, by spikes driven through both of them together. Then the cross was erected, and the foot of it, going into a hole made for that purpose, with a violent jerk often dislocated some of the bones of the crucified person who, being suspended in this dreadful posture, hung in most exquisite torture, till at length loss of blood and excessive pain ended his life. It is plain, that Jesus hung in this manner for six hours before he expired: yet it was thought wonderful that he died so soon; as many lived a whole day and night in this anguish, unless some method were taken to shorten their pains.—When the soldiers (four of whom were employed in it,) had completed the cruel business, they proceeded to part the clothes among them as their recompense; and finding the upper garment, worn by Jesus, to be made of one piece, they cast lots for it: (Notes, John 19:23,24.) thus several prophecies concerning the Messiah received their accomplishment in Jesus. (Note, Ps. 22:16—18.)—The quotation is verbatim from the Septuagint; which literally gives the meaning of the Hebrew. The whole quotation, however, is wanting in many manuscripts and ancient versions.

V. 36. The soldiers watched, that none might remove the bodies of the persons crucified, till it was ascertained that they were dead, and orders were given that they might be removed.

V. 37, 38. It was usual, at least in remarkable cases, to affix the name and the crime of the crucified person, in writing, on the top of the cross; and Pilate had ordered that it should be written in different languages over his head, "This is Jesus the Nazarene, the King of the Jews:" for God overruled his mind thus to attest the truth concerning Jesus, as the Messiah, the King of the Jewish nation, and of the whole Israel of God. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, John 19:20—22.) Yet at the same time two malefactors were crucified with him, and he was placed between them, as if more criminal than either of them; which was no doubt devised in order the more deeply to disgrace him.—'But this act of malignity, like many instances of the same nature, answered a purpose, which the authors of it little thought of, or intended. It was the completion of a prophecy of Isaiah, in which . . . he says of the Messiah, "He was numbered among the transgressors."' Bp. Porteus. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Is. 53:11,12. Mark 15:26—28, v. 28.)

V. 39—44. While the holy and divine Saviour was suspended, in this most ignominious and excruciating posture; the multitudes which passed by, knowing for what alleged crime he was crucified, reviled and derided him in every way which they could devise; reproaching him with having spoken of "destroying the temple, and rebuilding it in three days;"

and calling on him in derision to break loose, and come down from the cross, if he were "the Son of God." (Marg. Ref. m—q. Notes, 26:57—62, vv. 60,61. John 2:18—22.) From an ignorant and unprincipled rabble such behaviour might the less be wondered at: but the very priests, even the chief of them, and the scribes, the learned men, and rulers of the nation, forgetful of their character, office, education, and authority, and permitting their disdainful rage to overcome all regard to decorum, joined the multitude, and led them on to insult and mock the meek and suffering Jesus. They even reproached him with his miracles; allowing that he saved the lives of others, yet deriding him as unable to save his own. It was indeed an important truth, that if he would save sinners from eternal misery, he could not save himself from these exquisite sufferings and this ignominious death; but they did not understand this. They treated all the proofs of his being the Messiah with contempt, and called upon him, if he were indeed "the King of Israel, to come down from the cross, and they would believe in him." (Marg. Ref. r—t. Ps. 22:11—13. 16—18. Is. 49:7,8.) Not that this would have convinced them, for his resurrection had no such effect: but, assuring themselves that he could not rescue himself, they grew more hardened in unbelief, and used this cruel sarcasm to increase his anguish. (Note, Luke 16:27—31.) Nay, they reproached him for his confidence in God, and challenged God himself to deliver him, if he had any delight in him, seeing he had "called himself the Son of God." (Marg. Ref. u, x.) Probably they did not know, that in this daring impiety, enmity, and blasphemy, they used the very words which the prophet had put into the mouths of the murderers of the Messiah a thousand years before! (Note, Ps. 22:7,8, v. 8.) To complete this unparalleled scene, even the thieves who were crucified with him, could find a heart, in the midst of their own agonies and the horrid prospect which lay before them, to join the general voice, and to upbraid the crucified Jesus with his claim to be the Messiah, and "the Son of God." Though they suffered for notorious crimes, they escaped this obloquy and insult, and were regarded as objects of compassion; yet even they could look down on Jesus with disdain and derision! The evangelists Matthew and Mark speak as if both the malefactors had been guilty of this outrage: but it is not certain whether more than one of them be meant. (Marg. Ref. y. Note, Luke 23:39—43.)—We may challenge universal history to furnish another instance, in which any person, expiring under the tortures of a cruel execution, was treated with such derision, contempt, and mockery, by all ranks and orders of men, and even by one at least of his fellow-sufferers. This was reserved for the holy Jesus, "the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express Image of his Person," "God manifest in the flesh:" and this transaction is a full demonstration of apostate man's rancorous enmity to the holy image, truth, and law of his Creator; and a sufficient confutation of all the flattering representations of proud moralists and philosophers, who know more of every thing, than of God and of themselves. Indeed prophets and martyrs, who were renewed to some measure of the same image, and stood up for the same truths, always met with an adequate proportion of the same treatment: but it has been confined to them, and malefactors have almost universally been exempted from it. The perfect patience and meekness of this holy sufferer, in the midst of such provocations, which he was well able to avenge, is also worthy of our peculiar attention. (Notes, Ps. 35:13,14. Luke 23:32—38, v. 34. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 20—23.)

V. 45. It is here supposed, and will hereafter be shown, that Christ was nailed to the cross at "the third hour," or by nine o'clock in the morning: but this darkness did not begin before the sixth hour, or noon; and it lasted till the ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon. As the moon was then at the full, it could not be an eclipse from a natural cause: and probably it reached no further than the holy land, at least the language of the evangelists implies no more. (Notes, Mark 15:25,33.) The sun, however, seems to have been entirely obscured, and his beams intercepted; whence arose a most extraordinary and awful gloom. This was an apt emblem of the state of the spiritual world, when "the Sun of Righteousness," and "the Light of men" was under an eclipse; his soul being full of darkness and horror, his character wounded with reproaches and loaded with infamy, and his body ready to expire with torture. It was also an awful indication of the frown of heaven on the Jews and their rulers, who were guilty of this most enormous crime, from which the sun seemed to hide his astonished face, refusing his light to that land where it was committed.—Some infidels have greatly exulted, because Josephus and the Pagan writers have not mentioned this phenomenon: but none have attempted to deny it, and every writer notices and records only what he sees proper. Josephus, and the Pagan authors, were in general as little disposed to bear a favourable testimony to Christianity, as modern infidels are: the former could not but have heard of it, and his silence may be considered as the effect of his inability to deny the fact, and his unwillingness to admit the proper conclusion; but the heathen authors would probably treat the report with contempt and neglect, as unworthy of regard.—It is deserving of notice, that all the evangelists record the scoffs and insults of the spectators, before they mention this darkness, which, it is probable, for the time alarmed and silenced them.—Many things have been conjectured concerning the intenseness of this gloom; but little can be known: probably it was neither so intense, nor so slight, as different writers, contending with each other, have represented it. There is no proof, that during it, Jesus saw and spoke to his mother and the apostle John at a considerable distance, as some have supposed: for nothing appears from the narrative, why this might not take place either during the three hours which preceded the gloom, or just before Jesus expired, when it seems to have terminated. (Notes, 50. John 19:25—27.)—We have, however, the testimony of three evangelists, authenticated by miracles and prophecy, that such a darkness took place; and we may be sure it was sufficiently intense, to convince considerate persons, that it was an awful token of the wrath of God against the crucifiers of the holy Jesus.

V. 46. At the ninth hour, our Lord, being probably oppressed with a measure of the same inward horror, as when in the garden, cried out aloud, "Eli, Eli, lama, sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Note, Ps. 22:1.) The words are not exactly the same as they stand in the original of the psalm referred to, and they are supposed to be quoted in the Syro-Chaldaic dialect; but the meaning is precisely the same. This doleful exclamation of Jesus showed, that the total want of "the light of God's countenance" on his soul, and the sense of his frown and wrath against him, as our Surety, were far more dreadful than all his complicated outward sufferings; that his confidence in his Father, together with his love, zeal, submission, and every holy affection, were unabated and most perfect, even in that dreadful hour: and that there was no cause in him, why he should be thus forsaken, it being wholly through his willing answerableness for the sins of his people. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 26:36—39. Mark 15:34—39, v. 34.)—'This he did, in a deep sense of his Father's wrath unto mankind, in whose stead he now underwent that which was due for the sins of the whole world: while he said, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" implying that God had for the time withdrawn from him the sense and vision of his comfortable presence; and while he said, "My God," implying the strength of his faith, whereby he did firmly apprehend the sure and gracious aid of his eternal Father.' Bp. Hall.—Eli, &c.] למה אלי אלי עזבתני. Ὁ Θεος, ὁ Θεος μου, προσχες μοι, ἱνατι ἐγκατελιπες με; Ps. 22:1. Sept.

V. 47—49. Some of the persons present, who heard the words of Christ indistinctly, or who were not acquainted with the language or dialect in which they were spoken, supposed that he called upon Elias to come and rescue him: for, as it was understood that Elias was to be the forerunner of the Messiah, they probably thought that he meant thus to assert his claim to that character, even to the last. (Marg. Ref. d.)—About the same time he also said, "I thirst," being parched through excess of anguish and torture: and, as a vessel stood by filled with vinegar, (which being mixed with water, was commonly drunk by the Roman soldiers,) one of them filled a sponge with vinegar, and putting it on a reed, or a stalk of hyssop, reached it to him that he might drink: whilst the rest said, "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him." This seems to have been spoken in derision, and not from any expectation that Elias would actually come. (Notes, Ps. 69:21. John 19:28—30, vv. 28,29.)

V. 50. Perhaps the darkness continued nearly to the time when Jesus said, "It is finished:" and then the darkness and horror seem to have been removed also from his mind; and an inexpressible joy in the sense of his Father's love, the near approach of his glory, and the blessed effects of his sufferings, to have filled his soul. He therefore, immediately after, "cried out with a loud voice, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Notes, Luke 23:44—49, v. 46. John 19:28—30, v. 30.) This has been generally supposed to be an indication, that his strength was unbroken; and that when he "yielded up the ghost," or resigned his spirit, he did it voluntarily, "having power to lay down his life, and power to take it again." So that his soul could have left the body, at the very beginning of his lingering agonies, had he so pleased, as these were necessary only for the expiation of our sins.—[t] This view of the case ... suggests an illustration of the love of Christ manifested in his death, beyond what is commonly observed. Inasmuch as he did not use this power to quit his body, as soon as ever it was fastened to the cross, leaving only an insensible corpse to the cruelty of his murderers: but continued his abode in it, with a steady resolution, as long as it was proper; and then retired from it, with a majesty and dignity never known, or to be known, in any other death; dying, if I may so express it, like "the Prince of life." Doddridge.—Yielded up the ghost.] Αφηκε το πνευμα.—Resigned, or dismissed, the spirit. Εξεπνευσε, expired; Mark 15:37. Luke 23:46.—Παρεδωκε το πνευμα, delivered up the spirit; John 19:30.

V. 51—53. At that solemn time, the veil in the temple, which separated the most holy place from the other part of the sanctuary, was miraculously rent from top to bottom. This indicated, that the Mosaic dispensation was now virtually abolished, the types of the Levitical priesthood accomplished, the way into the holiest laid open, and the distinction between Jew and Gentile terminated, through that oblation which had just been offered.—(Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Ex. 26:31—33. Heb. 9:1—10. 10:19—22.) As this was the hour of the evening sacrifice, some of the priests must have been in the temple burning incense, at the time when it happened; and the rest of them, and even Caiaphas himself, must afterwards have seen the veil which had been rent: yet this prodigy made no impression on their hardened hearts, any more than the other events of that surprising day. This insensibility, amidst such astonishing miracles, appears to some persons almost incredible, and even beyond what human nature, depraved as it is, seems capable of. But it should be considered, that the most alarming and amazing scenes gradually lose their effect on the mind, when persons become familiar with them. Men live among the dead and dying, often without terror or reflection: and in an age when miracles were frequently wrought, many spectators would by habit grow familiar with them, as men do with scenes of carnage and desolation; especially, when the astonishment, at first excited by witnessing a miracle, was attended by a conviction which was resisted with deep aversion, and when every subsequent miracle was followed by a similar process. The minds of those, who thus "rebelled against the light," would of course be employed, with all the ingenuity which they possessed, in accounting for the wonderful events, without owning the hand of God in them, or the conclusion to be drawn from them, in favour of the Teacher, whose doctrine condemned their conduct, and was contrary to their prejudices, and their ambition, avarice, and wickedness. Thus the heart and conscience would gradually become more and more callous, as if "seared with a hot iron:" and God in awful justice would give the obstinate rebels up to judicial hardness and blindness. So that, in an age of miracles, it is highly reasonable to expect, that the opposers of the truth, thus divinely attested before their eyes, should become obdurate and insensible to a degree, which, to those who never witnessed miracles, must be inconceivable. (Notes, Ex. 4:21. 7:13. 9:12. 14:3,4. 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—At the time when "the veil was rent," there was also an earthquake, which rent the rocks in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and even opened the sepulchres in a very extraordinary manner: and after the resurrection of Christ, many of the bodies of departed "saints," or holy persons, who had fallen asleep in the faith, arose, came forth out of their graves, entered into Jerusalem, and appeared to several persons who knew them. Probably, they were such believers as had died not long before, and so arose after Christ, as it were, to grace his resurrection. It would, however, be wrong to indulge vain curiosity, by further inquiring who they were: but as they are said to have "appeared to many," and not to have continued with them; it seems probable, that they also went to heaven, with or after their ascended Saviour. This was a most extraordinary event; and doubtless it was generally spoken of in Jerusalem by those to whom they appeared. (*Marg. V. 54. The earthquake, and the other wonderful events which attended the crucifixion of Christ; together with his mild and patient behaviour under his sufferings, and the cheerful confidence, with which he commended his departing soul into the hands of God, had a powerful effect upon the minds of the Roman soldiers, though the Jewish rulers remained unimpressed. Only four soldiers were employed in nailing Jesus to the cross; but a considerable number, commanded by a centurion, watched him, whilst he hung there. These were greatly alarmed at what they saw and heard, and "they glorified God," perhaps by confessing their guilt and deprecating his vengeance; and they acknowledged, that "Truly this was the Son of God." It is not to be supposed that the soldiers, who joined with the Centurion in this confession, and who seem to have been the same as had crowned Jesus with thorns and mocked him, should understand the full meaning of these words: yet we may reasonably conclude, that this conviction terminated in the conversion at least of some of them, and perhaps of the very persons who nailed him to the cross; according to his prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." (Note, Luke 23:32—38, v. 34.)—Some would interpret the words recorded by Matthew, "Truly this was the Son of God," by those of Luke, "This was a righteous man." But in fact that expression is explained by this; for as Jesus was crucified for saying that he was "the Son of God;" so, if he were a righteous man and unjustly condemned, he must be "the Son of God." (Marg. Ref. r.)—[t] Thus Jesus was put to death upon pretence of blasphemy; for that he gave himself out for the Son of God: but these things plainly show, that he said nothing but truth of himself.' Bp. Hall.—A son of a god, according to the notions of the pagans, say some: but could the officer and soldiers, who crucified Christ, be ignorant that he was put to death for averring himself to be "the Son of God?" Surely then this supposed crime was referred to; though those who said it, might not well understand their own words.—[t] He is condemned to death, as a blasphemer, for saying, "I am the Son of God;" but truly this was the Son of God.' Middleton on the Greek article has shown, that Θεου Υιος, and Υιος του Θεου, are used without any exact discrimination.—[t] The Centurion could not fail to know the alleged blasphemy for which our Saviour suffered; and had he intended in heathen phraseology to express his admiration of our Saviour's conduct, he would not have called our Saviour Θεου Υιος.' *Bp. V. 55, 56. Among the witnesses of this melancholy and interesting scene, there were some women who had followed Jesus from Galilee, and had waited on him; supplying his wants from their substance. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 8:1—3.) Anxious concern and affection induced them to be present; and perhaps they stood afar off, for fear of the outrages of the multitude. Words cannot express, nay, imagination fails to conceive, the mixed emotions of love, reverence, gratitude, sorrow, compassion, anxiety, and despondency, which must have agitated their minds on this occasion. We find from John, who also was present, that "Mary the mother of Jesus" was a spectator of the distressing scene; when "a sword must indeed have pierced her heart," and inmost soul. (Note, Luke 2:33—35, v. 35.)

city of Samuel. (Marg. Ref. b.) He was a rich and honourable person; a counsellor, or member of the sanhedrim, and a pious man, who had not consented to the proceedings of the rulers against Jesus: for he probably absented himself when this was agitated, finding he could not make any effectual resistance. He also "waited for the kingdom of God," expecting the Messiah as a spiritual Redeemer, and he had secretly become a disciple of Jesus; but being timid, moving in a high rank in society, and knowing the malignity of the rulers, he had not openly confessed his faith. It pleased God to leave him thus far under the power of his unbelieving fears; because he intended him for a service, from which he might have been precluded, if he had rendered himself obnoxious to the ruling powers. But, when the courage of our Lord's stated followers failed them, he found himself animated to a more decided conduct; and his faith being invigorated by the circumstances attending the death of Christ, he determined no longer to conceal his opinion. He, therefore, "went boldly to Pilate," and desired leave to take the body of Jesus, that he might give it an honourable interment; and that it might not be buried on the spot, as those of malefactors generally were. Accordingly, when Pilate found by inquiry that Jesus was dead, being convinced of his innocence, he did not hesitate to order that the body should be delivered to Joseph; though he must have known that this would be highly displeasing to the Jewish rulers. Having obtained this permission, and being assisted by Nicodemus, Joseph went and took the body of Jesus from the cross, wrapped it in linen cloth, with a quantity of myrrh, aloes, and other aromatics, which had been procured for that purpose; and immediately conveyed it into a new sepulchre which he had prepared for himself. This was situated in a garden near the spot, and had been hewn out of the solid rock; and there was only one entrance into it, which he closed with a large stone, when he had deposited the body of Jesus in it. The interment of Christ was thus hastily performed, because the Sabbath was near; and probably Joseph and his friend proposed afterwards more carefully to embalm the body: at the same time Mary Magdalene and the other Mary before mentioned witnessed the transaction, and formed their plan for testifying their respect to the remains of their beloved and honoured Master. V. 62—66. Some think that this occurred as soon as the sun was set, after our Lord's crucifixion; for at that hour the sabbath entered.—'It is wonderful, that these most superstitious men, should not have scrupled to violate the rest of the sabbath, by sealing the sepulchre and placing a guard.' Beza. The day that followed the crucifixion of our Lord was the sabbath, and peculiarly solemn, by reason of the feast of the passover which was then celebrating; and the day on which he was crucified, was observed as a preparation for it: (Marg. Ref.) yet the malicious zeal of the chief priests induced them to come, on that great solemnity, in a body to Pilate, to represent to him, that Jesus (whom they confidently called "that deceiver") had said repeatedly during his lifetime, that he would rise again on the third day. This had always been in connexion with predictions of his violent death: and they in fact had paid more attention to it than the disciples had done. (Marg. Ref. k.)—As his friends, therefore, had been permitted to bury him, the rulers desired that he would give orders to secure the sepulchre "until the third day;" (which shows what they understood by the words "after three days;") lest his disciples should come in a clandestine manner, steal away the body, spread the report that he was risen, and thus seduce the people into a more fatal error than ever.—It was indeed very unlikely, that the terrified disciples, who in that case could expect no better usage than their Master had just received, would, even if wicked enough, have either courage or inclination for such an imposture. This, however, was providentially permitted, in order to give the more indisputable demonstration of our Lord's resurrection. Pilate, in answer, observed to them, that they had a body of Roman soldiers at their command, who were stationed near the temple to keep watch there: of these they might take as many as they pleased, and such as they could most depend on: and secure the sepulchre as carefully as they could. Accordingly they went, and placed a strong guard at the sepulchre: affixing their seal to the stone which closed the mouth of it, that there might be no collusion between the soldiers and the disciples. Thus they were themselves satisfied, that they had made it sure by every needful precaution.—'The chief priests having taken these precautions, waited, probably with no small impatience, for the third day after the crucifixion, ... when they made no doubt they should find the body in the sepulchre, and convict Jesus of deceit and imposture.' Bp. Porteus.—The number of the soldiers on guard is supposed to have been sixty. (Notes, 28:1—8, v. 4,11—15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Whilst wicked men pursue their primary object with unwearied assiduity, and sacrifice rest, indulgence, and every other interest, in order to secure it; let none of the servants of God remain inactive, or shrink from difficulty, in their "work and labour of love."—The advantages attainable by sin, appear in prospect very desirable to the carnal mind but they contain far more bitterness than satisfaction, when actually possessed.—Men foresee very little of the consequences of their crimes, at the time when they commit them; but they must be answerable for all: and the anguish and remorse of Judas, when he saw that Jesus was condemned, should impress our minds with some idea of what wicked men will feel hereafter, when they shall learn all the fatal effects of their infidelity, impiety, licentiousness, and iniquity. In this world, there is ground of hope for the vilest transgressors: and, when deeply convinced of their guilt, they should be reminded, that their chief danger arises from temptations to despair of God's mercy.—When faith and hope are totally wanting, repentance itself cannot be genuine: and the enemy, who once persuaded his deluded servants that their sins were small, and that they had nothing to fear, will at length, perhaps, take occasion, from some special aggravations of their crimes, to represent them to their affrighted imaginations as absolutely unpardonable; that he may drive them to desperate wickedness, or to suicide. For, though he cannot himself destroy them, he has very great influence in urging them thus to plunge themselves beyond the reach of mercy: and God often gives up those especially into his power, who have sinned wilfully against much light and conviction.—Many things, which accompany true repentance, may yet be found where that is wanting: a deep remorse for atrocious crimes, which have made dreadful inroads on the conscience, an open confession of sin in some particulars, and a restitution of the wages of iniquity, will not prove that man truly penitent, who is not humbled for all the sin of his heart and conduct; who does not rely solely on the mercy of God in Jesus Christ: or who does not learn to hate sin, to love God, to submit to his will, and to "walk in newness of life." But no warnings can withdraw hardened hypocrites from their purpose: they will treat such, even of their accomplices, as show remorse for their crimes, with the most disdainful neglect, and concur with Satan in driving them to despair: and, while they are deliberately perpetrating the most atrocious iniquities, they will keep up the appearance of strict devotion, avow the most exact conscientiousness, and affect the praise of beneficence! And God sometimes perpetuates the memory of their crimes, and fulfils the prophecies of his word, by means of those very actions, in which they most deliberately rebelled against him.—Of how small estimation must spiritual excellency be among men, when even Israelites valued the divine Saviour at no more than the price of the meanest slave!

V. 11—18. Who can reflect on the malice, envy, dissimulation, and murderous rage, of the Jewish priests and rulers on the prevaricating cowardly injustice of Pilate; on the conduct of the multitude, in preferring a murderer to the holy Jesus, and in clamorously demanding his crucifixion; or on the insults and cruelty of the soldiers, without horror and indignation? But let us not deem these instances any other, than a fair specimen of human nature; let us not imagine that "the Lord of glory" would meet with better usage, if he were now to appear on earth in disguise, and to testify concerning his nominal disciples "that their works were evil," in the same manner that he did of the Jews. Still he would be "despised and rejected of men," and meet with decided opposition; still numbers would pursue him with revilings and cruel mockings: and others would be afraid or ashamed to acknowledge their relation to him: still there would be found chief priests, scribes, rulers, and Pharisees, whose hypocrisy and ignorance he had exposed, whose consciences he had galled, and whose authority and reputation he had undermined, to persecute him with unrelenting malice and revenge: still there would be ungodly Pilates, who, being persuaded of his innocency, and knowing that he was persecuted from envy, would yet deem it impolitic to risk any thing in his cause; and, after some feeble efforts to stem the torrent, or to throw the blame on others, would prostitute authority to sanction the unrighteous decrees of his enemies: still the unstable multitude would to-day cry "Hosanna," and to-morrow "Crucify him:" still hardened scoffers would divert themselves with his ignominy and anguish; and even wretches would be found, who would try to forget their own misery by reviling him.—But are we not all concerned? Alas! how often is Barabbas preferred to Jesus! When sinners reject his salvation, that they may retain their darling sins, which rob God of his glory, and murder their own souls, and those of other men; they repeat the disgraceful transaction: when the society of pious ministers and Christians is forsaken, for the company of profligates and infidels, the preference is of the same nature: and indeed we are all apt, in some instances and in some measure, to prefer the friendship and interest of this evil world, to the commands, glory, and approbation of the Son of God.—But we must also remember, that "he was wounded for our transgressions;" in this sense we are all chargeable with the guilt of his crucifixion; and our sins were as the scourge, the thorns, and the nails, by which he suffered. When his disciples act inconsistently with their character, and cause his enemies to revile or deride; they then deliver up the blessed Jesus to be again mocked, spit on, crowned with thorns, and loaded with every indignity: whilst they, who treat his followers with cruelty and contempt, act over again the part of the Roman soldiers, and the Jewish rulers and people: and when professed Christians openly apostatize, "they crucify the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."—Imbittered persecutors are often so hurried away by their furious zeal, that even infidels can discern the malignant principles by which they are actuated; and the people of God may expect more favour from the most avowed profligates, than from hypocrites.

V. 19—25. The warnings, which God sends, by various means, to deter men from wickedness, will eventually leave many of them the more inexcusable: but what will be the guilt and condemnation of those, who use authority, influence, and ingenuity, to set men against the gospel; and thus ruin multitudes of immortal souls!—Various and irrational are the means, by which men seek impunity, in acting contrary to their own consciences: they sometimes plead necessity or compulsion; when nothing but unbelief, fear of man, and regard to worldly interest, compel them: and they often throw the blame on others, vainly hoping to have the pleasure or advantage of iniquity themselves, and to leave the punishment to be suffered by their tempters. But all the water in the ocean cannot wash away the guilt of murder from those rulers, who, even reluctantly, permit innocent blood to be shed for political purposes; as it is their bounden duty at all hazards to protect the oppressed. Such as are bent upon evil, are commonly most clamorous when their conduct is most unreasonable: persecutors are generally most ready to call for the instruments of torture or death, when it is inquired, "What evil have these persons done?" and in every case, when arguments are wanting, men are prone to abound in vociferation, in order to silence both their opponents and their own consciences. But, who can reflect without terror at the awful imprecation of the Jewish multitude, and its tremendous accomplishment? What miseries did they call for on themselves! What a legacy did they leave to even their remote posterity! Yet there is mercy in reserve for a remnant of that nation: let us then pray for them, that at length they "may look to him, whom they have pierced, and mourn for their sins," in true repentance and with living faith. (Note, Zech. 12:9—14, v. 10.)—All, however, who delight in anathemas and imprecations, will find that they rebound upon themselves.

V. 26—44. Under trivial injuries, we worthless creatures are prone to complain bitterly, and even to retort or retaliate on those who offend us: but the holy and divine Saviour endured the most complicated indignities and cruelties, without a murmur, an angry word, or a menace! In the meekness and dignity of heavenly wisdom, he heard unmoved the false accusations with which he was pursued; the preference given to a murderer before him; the ungrateful people, whose diseases he had healed, and whose wants he had supplied, demanding his crucifixion; the iniquitous sentence passed on him: and the sarcasms and cruel derision of the soldiers, the people, the rulers, and even of the malefactors. Without the least impatience, he suffered his sacred body to be torn with the scourge, his head to be wounded with the thorns, and his hands and feet to be pierced: and thus he met the horrors of the most excruciating death, and the shame of being numbered among the worst of criminals, with the most entire resignation to his Father's will, the most ardent love and zeal for his glory, and the deepest compassion even for his cruel murderers. He was also as much superior to fear, as to anger or impatience; and he supported his most complicated sufferings with a gravity, a sensibility, and a fortitude, equally distant from the ill-timed disgusting levity, which some have shown in the prospect of immediate death, and the sullen affectation of insensibility which others have displayed: so that all which has been admired in the death of heroes or philosophers, is no more comparable to the setting of this "Sun of Righteousness," than the glimmering taper is to the clear light of day. But let us especially consider this conduct of the Saviour as our pattern: and recollect that all our fretfulness, peevishness, bitterness, and despondency are indeed acts of rebellion, which could not have been pardoned, but through the shedding of his precious blood. Let us remember, that we are called to do good, and suffer evil, in this present world; let us keep a guard over our spirits and at the door of our lips, when we are injured, insulted, and afflicted; let us consider how "light our afflictions" are, and how mixed with consolations, when compared with those of our divine Surety; and let us never expect or desire kind usage from such characters as "crucified the Lord of glory."

V. 45—50. Our blessed Redeemer endured all his other complicated sufferings in silent submission: but the frown and wrath of the Father, which he bare for our sins, extorted the doleful exclamation, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" What then will be the misery of those, who shall for ever be forsaken by God, and sink under his wrath and absolute despair! The believer, who has tasted a few drops of the cup, which the Saviour drank off to the very dregs, in the garden and on the cross—who has lost for a season the comfort of communion with God, and dreads lest he should come finally short of his favour, and is oppressed with a sense of his displeasure—can frame some feeble conceptions on this awful subject. Thence he learns to estimate in some degree the immensity of the Saviour's love: thence he acquires deeper convictions of the evil and desert of sin, and of his obligations to him, "who hath delivered us from the wrath to come;" and thence he is led to consider the words, "Depart from me," which unbelievers little regard or dread, as more tremendous even than the unquenchable fire prepared for the devil and his angels. But, how must adoring angels have been filled with astonishment, when they witnessed their incarnate Lord and Creator thus despised and hated by sinful men! Nothing could more astonish these holy spectators, than the madness and wickedness of his foes; except it were his patience in bearing with them, when his frown must at once have sunk them into hell; his compassion for the souls of those who were by nature so deeply depraved, in thus agonizing and dying for them; and his power and grace, in thus triumphing over the prince of darkness, even in that deepest scene of his humiliation. Thus were the purposes and prophecies of God accomplished; thus was his "law magnified," his justice satisfied, and his holiness displayed; thus was the way opened for us sinners to "the throne of grace" now, and to the kingdom of glory hereafter. Yet, never were the horrid nature and effects of sin so tremendously displayed, from the creation of the world to this time, nor ever shall be, as on that important day, when the beloved Son of the Father hung upon the cross, "suffering once for sin, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." So great was the wickedness then committed, that the sun might well hide his astonished head, the earth be clothed with sable, and nature herself be thrown into convulsions, as in sympathy with her expiring Lord. Our God will not grant presumptuous unbelievers those proofs of the truth of his word, which they arrogantly require, and with which they would by no means be satisfied: but he will give to every inquirer such as are proper, in his own time and manner; and he will deliver, and receive to himself, all those who trust in him, however men may deride their confidence, as his children. Their trials may be sharp, and appear tedious; and at sometimes, they may cry "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But they will be enabled at last to say, "Into thy hands I commend my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O LORD, thou God of truth." (Notes, Ps. 31:5. Acts 7:54—60, v. 60.)

V. 51—56. Our divine Saviour has, by dying, deprived death of his terrific sting, and removed all obstructions to the happiness of his people. He has consecrated the grave, to be the quiet repository of the bodies of his sleeping saints, and has prepared for its future opening again, to restore them immortal and glorious, by his resurrection, as the first-fruits of that blessed harvest; that they may for ever inhabit the holy city above, "where is fulness of joy at his right hand for evermore." We may also reflect with comfort on the abundant attestations, which were given to the character of the calumniated Jesus; in that all concerned in his death were constrained to say, "This was a righteous man," "This was

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Early on the first day of the week the women go to the sepulchre, 1. An earthquake, and an angel rolling away the stone, terrify the guard, 2—4. The angel declares the resurrection of Jesus to the women, and orders them to tell the disciples, 5—8. Jesus himself appears to them, 9, 10. The priests hire the soldiers to say, that the disciples had stolen the body while they slept, 11—15. Jesus appears to the disciples in Galilee, 16, 17. He sends them to preach the gospel, and baptize all nations; and promises his presence with his church to the end of the world, 18—20.

IN [a]the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came [b]Mary Magdalene and the other Mary to see the sepulchre.

2 And, behold, [c]there [*]was a great earthquake: [d]for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it.

3 His [e]countenance was like lightning, and [f]his raiment white as snow.

4 And for fear of him [g]the keepers did [h]shake, and became as dead men.

5 And the angel answered and said unto the women, [i]Fear not ye: for I know that [k]ye seek Jesus, which was crucified.

6 He [l]is not here; for he is risen, [l]as he said. [m]Come, see the place where the Lord lay:

7 And [n]go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, [o]he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: [p]lo, I have told you.

8 And they departed quickly from the sepulchre [q]with fear and great joy, and did run to bring his disciples word.

9 ¶ And [r]as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, [s]All hail. And they came [t]and held him by the feet, and [u]worshipped him.

10 Then said Jesus unto them, [x]Be not afraid: [y]go tell [z]my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

the King of Israel," "Truly this was the Son of God:" and we also, "exercising ourselves to have a conscience void of offence," may leave it to the Lord to vindicate our reputation. Let us at the same time always keep our faith fixed on every illustration of that truth, that "where sin hath abounded, grace much more abounds:" observing that ignorant idolaters are far more frequently brought to glorify God, and confess faith in his Son, than proud Pharisees and hypocrites. As "God spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" "Hereby we know his love" to sinful men: may we then prove our love to him, by crucifying our lusts, and resigning our dearest earthly comforts, at his word, for his glory, or in submission to his providence. In short, let us, not only "afar off," but as nearly and closely as we can, contemplate this affecting scene; that our hearts may be melted into godly sorrow, weaned from this world, encouraged in hope, animated by love, admiration, and gratitude; that we may glory in his cross alone, and be induced to yield ourselves most willingly to his service.

V. 57—66. The Lord has a chosen remnant among various descriptions of men: and, whilst we find a Judas among the apostles, and a Joseph in the Jewish sanhedrim, we should learn not to condemn whole societies for the crimes, or to sanction them for the good conduct, of an individual, or even of several individuals belonging to them. The heart-searching Saviour knows even his secret disciples: and though we must not excuse the timidity of such, as for a time are afraid of confessing him before his inveterate enemies; yet we should make allowances for difficult situations, and approve of conscientiousness and holy singularity, in men surrounded by the worst of examples: nor must we "despise the day of small things." But we should especially adore the mysteries of divine wisdom, in preparing men for particular services in the church; and the sovereign power of his grace, which sometimes gives courage to the fearful, when the most intrepid are intimidated. Thus he provides for the honour of his name and the support of his cause, and defeats the purposes of his most implacable and potent adversaries. Let us then be willing to be accounted "deceivers," and to pass "through evil report and good report," as our Lord did: for if we be upright in the sight of God, all the suspicions and endeavours of men to disgrace us will tend to their confusion, and the manifestation of our integrity; even as the precautions of the Jewish rulers tended to prove the resurrection of Jesus, and to forward the success of the gospel.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—8. 'Christ having put death to flight in the sepulchre, riseth by his own power, as straightway the angel witnesseth.' Beza.—The Lord Jesus expired on the afternoon preceding the sabbath: his body lay in the grave the remainder of that day, during all the sabbath, and part of the day after, which began at sunset: so that he arose early in the morning on the third day. "In the end of the sabbath," or after that the sabbath was ended, and the day dawned on the first day of the week, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary went to see the sepulchre; and to examine whether it remained in the same state, in which it had been left on the evening of his burial; knowing nothing of the guard which had been afterwards placed there. Probably, the women, mentioned by the other evangelists, followed some time after with the spices. (Notes, 27:62—66. Mark 16:1—4. John 20:1—10, vv. 1,2.) But before any of them arrived, most astonishing events had taken place: "a great earthquake" had announced the approaching resurrection of Jesus, and probably thrown the soldiers into consternation; and then an angel appearing in a most glorious form, "rolled way the stone from the door" of the sepulchre, and sat down on it; which affrighted the soldiers, so that they became senseless, as if they had been dead: but it is probable, that at length coming to themselves, they recovered courage enough to flee from the terrifying scene. In the mean time, the Lord arose from the dead; reuniting his human soul to his body by his own divine power, and leaving the sepulchre as a mighty conqueror over death and the grave. When the women therefore came to the sepulchre, they found the stone rolled from the door. It is probable, that Mary Magdalene immediately returned to the city to inform the apostles: whilst the other women examined the sepulchre; and at length saw a vision of angels, one of whom addressed them in the most encouraging manner; bidding them not fear, because, as they came to seek and honour Jesus who had been crucified, they had abundant cause for confidence and joy, seeing he was indeed risen; and inviting them to examine the place where he had lain, calling him THE LORD, that is, the Lord o. angels as well as men. He then commanded them to go with all speed to inform the disciples of these particulars, that they might share the comfort of the glad tidings, and prepare to meet him in Galilee; where the whole company would have the inexpressible satisfaction of beholding him: and as he, an angel of God, had expressly told them these things, they must not doubt the truth of them, how extraordinary soever they might appear; or neglect to report them, for fear of being decmed credulous visionaries. Upon this they immediately departed, with mingled affections of terror and joy, but the latter seems to have been the most prevalent; and they ran with haste to carry word to his disciples. (*Marg. V. 9, 10. As the women were going to the city, Jesus himself was pleased to appear to them, and congratulate them on the arrival of that joyful morning; expressing his ardent good-will and affection for them. The original word means, "Rejoice ye."—And after they had embraced his feet, and worshipped him with deep humility, profound reverence, and joyful love, yet not without some emotions of fear; he encouraged them, and ordered them to proceed on their way to inform his disciples; (whom he very graciously called "his brethren," notwithstanding their desertion of him in his sufferings;) assuring them, that the whole company should have the satisfaction of seeing him in Galilee, at a time and place appointed. (Marg. Ref.)—It is obvious to every attentive reader, that there is some difficulty in arranging the various circumstances, recorded by the evangelists, into one compact narration: and it is plain, they did not write in concert; but the Lord was pleased to direct each of the sacred historians to write those incidents, which most impressed his own mind. When the different accounts have been separately considered, a compendious view will be given of the most approved method, by which they have been shown to be consistent with each other: and that will be the proper place also for a brief statement of the complex demonstration afforded us of this important event, on which the truth of Christianity, and all our hopes depend. (Notes, John 20:18,24—29, v. 29.)

V. 11—15. 'The more the sun shineth, the more are the wicked blinded.' Beza.—' It may be said, that this account is the representation of friends, of those who were interested in asserting the reality of the resurrection; but that there is probably another story told by the opposite party, ... which may set the matter in a different point of view; and that before we can judge fairly of the question, we must hear what they have to say of it. ... This is certainly very proper and reasonable. ... There is, we acknowledge, another account given by the Jews; and ... the sacred historians ... tell us what this opposite story was.' Bp. Porteus.—It should also be observed, that this is the only account given of these transactions by the opposite party: at least no other is extant, (nor do we read of any other in ancient writers,) except that which is contained in the verses under consideration.—The Roman soldiers seem to have been the first who gave intimations of the resurrection of Jesus. Probably, some of them retired to their quarters, or into the city, and dispersed uncertain rumours of what had passed; while some of the leaders went to make their report to the chief priests and rulers, by whom they were set to watch the sepulchre. It is not conceivable, but that the latter must have been convinced that the events were miraculous, and afraid that Jesus was indeed risen again as he had predicted: but they had engaged all their credit, and authority, and even safety, in this unequal contest; they could not think of submitting or receding; and there was no other way left, but to conceal, if possible, what had taken place. (Note, 2:3—6.) They therefore deliberated on the subject, and could devise no better project, than to bribe the soldiers to deny the facts which they had reported, and to propagate an absurd falsehood instead of them: and, as the soldiers had no serious convictions that they were any ways concerned in these transactions; they bargained for a large sum of money, and agreed to accuse the disciples of having stolen the body when they were asleep. At the same time, the rulers undertook to secure them from punishment, if Pilate should be informed that they had slept on duty, which was death by the Roman law. Accordingly, they took the money, and said what they were ordered; and this report was circulated with such diligence and success, that it was commonly current among the Jews when Matthew wrote his gospel; and no one, as far as we can learn, attempted to disprove it, when thus published to the world. Yet was it a falsehood, which confuted itself, and was the most effectual acknowledgment of the obstinacy and malice of those who invented it, that can be imagined. Had all the soldiers been asleep, they could not have known any thing which passed: if some were awake, why did they not alarm the others? Moreover, if they had slept, they would not have dared to mention it: if it had been discovered, the Jewish rulers would certainly have done their utmost to bring them to condign punishment: and had there been the least shadow of probability in the accusation, they would assuredly have prosecuted the apostles with the most unrelenting vengeance. (Notes, Acts 4:13—22. 5:27,28.)—For their credit and authority were most deeply concerned: so that this single omission was a full demonstration, that they did not believe one word of the report which they so industriously circulated. It was also improbable in the extreme, that the intimidated apostles and disciples should attempt such an action, which would have been excessively rash, even in the most experienced soldiers: it was still more improbable, that they should succeed; and if they had, reproach, torture, and death, were the whole recompense which they could possibly have expected. But, in fact, the Jewish rulers were determined not to confess the truth: and as they knew not what to say, they were reduced to the distressing necessity of circulating one of the most senseless lies which ever was devised. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16, 17. Several appearances of Christ are here passed over in silence; but his meeting with the disciples, by appointment, in Galilee, is particularly mentioned. (Notes, Mark 16:9—16. Luke 24:13—43. John 20:11—23,24—29, v. 29.) Most of the apostles were inhabitants of that district: Jesus had far more disciples in Galilee than in Judea, and was personally known to far greater numbers. Probably, this was the time when he appeared to "above five hundred brethren at once." (Note, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 6.) The place appointed for this purpose was a mountain, perhaps Tabor, on which he had been transfigured. When the disciples saw him, and were satisfied that he was really risen from the dead, they worshipped him, as "the Son of God" and "the Lord of all." But there were some who doubted at the first, yet probably they were at length convinced. As all the apostles had before this repeatedly seen him, and as even incredulous Thomas had been fully satisfied of his resurrection; we cannot understand this of any of them, but of some of the five hundred brethren who were gathered together on this occasion.—'This circumstance shows the scrupulous fidelity of the sacred historians, who ... fairly tell you every thing that passed on this and similar occasions, whether it appears to make for them or against them.' Bp. Porteus.

V. 18. It is not certain, whether what is next recorded took place in Galilee, or after the return of the disciples to Jerusalem, and just before our Lord's ascension. He, however, came and conversed with them of those "things, that pertained to the kingdom of God;" and informed them, that, in consequence of his humiliation, he was now invested with all authority, in heaven and earth, over angels and men, in regulating the course of providence, and in communicating all spiritual blessings, for the benefit of his church.—' The word here is authority, not power: but it is manifest that these differ from each other; for many are not able to perform those things which they have a right to do; and on the contrary, many have power to do those things which they have no right to do.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, 11:27. John 3:27—36, vv. 35,36. 5:20—29. 13:3—5, v. 3. 17:1—3, v. 2. Eph. 1:15—23, vv. 20,21. Phil. 2:9—11. 1 Pet. 1:21,22. Rev. 1:12—20, v. 18. 11:15—18.)—This authority is given to Christ, as Emmanuel, as the Son of Man, and as Mediator: but did he not possess all divine perfections, how could he exercise it? 'He to whom any office is committed, must have sufficient power and wisdom to discharge that office. Now to govern all things in heaven and earth, belongs only to him who is the Lord and Maker of them. ... To have power over death, and to be able to raise the dead, is to have that power which is proper to God alone: and to have power over the souls of men, and the knowledge of all hearts, belongs to God alone.' Whitby.

V. 19, 20. After this solemn declaration of his sovereign authority over all creatures, received in human nature from the Father; our Lord proceeded to give his commission to the apostles especially, but certainly to his other ministers and disciples also, according to their several stations in the church, to propagate his religion "among all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Ps. 22:27—31. Mark 16:14—16. Luke 24:44—49. Acts 1:4—8, v. 8.) The apostles were however so much under the influence of Jewish prejudices, that they did not understand this commission as authorizing them to preach to the Gentiles, till a considerable time after the descent of the Holy Spirit! (Note, Acts 11: 1—3,18.) There are two words in this passage, which are translated teach and teaching; but they are of a different meaning. The former means that general instruction which was necessary to bring men to profess themselves the disciples of Christ; and the other relates to their more particular subsequent instruction, in all the various parts of Christianity. —As the words might have stood in the same order, if it had been a command to 'go, and convert all the nations to Judaism, circumcising them in the name of the God of Israel, and teaching them to observe the law of Moses;' no argument can hence be fairly adduced respecting the subjects of baptism. For in this case it would have been understood, that the adult males must be circumcised on a profession of the Jewish religion, and their infant offspring at the time appointed: and in like manner all adults admitted into the church from among the Jews and Gentiles, must be instructed in Christianity before they were baptized; though their infant offspring might be baptized also: and the case is exactly the same still. —The general nature of baptism has already been explained, (Note, 3:6.) but we have here an account of the appropria-tizing them in [n]the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;

20 Teaching [o]them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, [p]I am with you alway, even [q]unto the end of the world. [r]Amen.

tion of this institution to the Christian dispensation.' The apostles and preachers of the gospel were ordered to baptize those who embraced the gospel, "into the name (not names) "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." (Note, Num. 6:24—27.) This is a most irrefragable proof of the doctrine of the Trinity; that is, of the Deity of the Son, and of the distinct personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit: for it would be absurd to suppose that a mere man, or creature, or a mere modus, or quality of God, should be joined with the Father, in the one "name," into which all Christians are baptized. To be baptized into the name of any one, implies in the person so baptized a professed dependence on him, and devoted subjection to him: (Note, 1 Cor. 1:10—16, vv. 13—15.) to be baptized therefore "into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," implies a professed dependence on these three divine Persons, jointly and equally, and a devoting of ourselves to them as worshippers and servants. This is proper and obvious, upon the supposition of the mysterious unity of three coequal Persons in the unity of the Godhead; but not to be accounted for upon any other principles. Christianity is the religion of a sinner, who relies for salvation from wrath, and sin, and all evil, on the mercy of the Father, through the Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation of the incarnate Son, and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit; and who in consequence gives up himself to be the worshipper and servant of the triune JEHOVAH, in all his ordinances and commandments; that, according to the ancient and excellent doxology, 'Glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost: as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be.'—Baptism is an outward sign of that inward washing, or sanctification of the Spirit, which seals and evidences the believer's justification. When an adult is baptized, he avows his acceptance of this salvation, and makes this surrender of himself to the service of God his Saviour. When we bring our infant offspring to be baptized, we express our earnest desire that they may share the same benefits, and be the redeemed and accepted worshippers and servants of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit: we renew our own profession of faith and devotedness to this one God in three Persons: and we pledge ourselves to God and his church to use all proper means to "bring up our children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" in hope of their being made partakers of the inward and spiritual grace of baptism. As far as these things are attended to, they have a most salutary effect both on parents and children; and this sacrament thus administered, helps to keep up the remembrance of the principal doctrines of Christianity, in all places where it is used. (Note, and P. O. 19:13—15. Note, Mark 10:13—16.)—There can be no reasonable doubt that the apostles and primitive Christians always administered baptism in this very form: and it would be strange to infer their disobedience to so express a command of Christ, from the brevity with which matters of this nature are recorded in 'the Acts of the Apostles.' Indeed it would be a most daring presumption in any man to alter it, as if he knew better than the Lord himself in what manner to administer this sacrament.—When our Lord had thus instituted baptism, and directed the apostles in respect of the subsequent instruction of their converts; (which demands our most careful and obedient consideration, as his parting command to his ministers;) being about to depart from them as to his visible presence, he said, "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." He did not say, to death, or to eternity; for that might have been restricted personally to the apostles; but "to the end of the world:" which must include all succeeding true missionaries and ministers, all congregations and disciples in every age and nation even to the consummation of all things. He is with us, in the power of his protecting providence; by the influences of his teaching, sanctifying, and comforting Spirit; and in the communication of all spiritual blessings from the favour of his omnipresent Deity: and we should realize him with us, in secret and in social worship, and in our public assemblies. (Note, 18:20.) To this, the word Amen is affixed, probably by the Evangelist as expressing his desire that it might be so; and perhaps to lead the reader to convert the promise into a prayer, for himself, and for every part of the church. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Our God can with infinite ease accomplish his promises, by methods which are beyond the expectations of his friends, as well as in defiance of all his enemies. Let us with joy contemplate the divine Saviour, bursting the barriers of the grave, and triumphing over "the king of terrors" by his glorious resurrection. Thus he proved himself "the Son of God and the King of Israel;" he evinced the sufficiency and acceptance of his atoning sacrifice; and he became "the First-fruits of the resurrection," "the First-begotten from the dead," and the Author of spiritual and eternal life to his people. Vain were the precautions of the Jewish rulers; vain the stone, the seal, the guard of valiant soldiers! These only served to render the illustrious event more incontestable. But if the earthquake and a single angel could so terrify the Roman guards, whose courage had been renowned through every age and nation; where will the wicked appear, when the same power shall raise the dead, destroy the visible creation, and be displayed to judge the world? Yet, the humble weeping penitents, who in faith and love "seek Jesus who was crucified," to be saved through his precious blood, and employed in his service, and to honour him as they are able, need fear none of these things! None can so accuse them, as to compass their condemnation; because Jesus who died for them is risen again, and "ever liveth" to plead their cause: all holy angels are their friends and guardians, and neither earth nor hell, life nor death, can hurt them. While they behold the place where the dear Redeemer lay, they find themselves gradually reconciled to death and the grave, and inspired with the hopes of a glorious resurrection, and with the joyful expectation, that "when he shall appear, then shall they also appear with him in glory." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)—We are now called to rejoice with our risen Lord, as we not long since were to sympathize in his sufferings, and attend his funeral: let us then delight to tell to all around us, that "the Lord is risen indeed," and is perfected to be "the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him."—The believer, however, will not always be able to divest himself of fear, even when he has the most abundant cause for joy; and he may think himself highly favoured in this present world, if hope and cheerfulness generally prevail. When we endeavour to obey the word sent us by the servants of our Lord, he will manifest himself unto us, dispel our fears, confer blessings, and cause us to worship him with adoring love and joyful gratitude: for, notwithstanding his majesty and purity, and our meanness and unworthiness, and many offences, he still condescends to call us his "brethren!"

V. 11—20. The malice of proud persecutors cannot be overcome even by demonstration: nay, avarice itself will expend large sums, to silence the evidence of the truth, and to propagate error; policy will adopt the most foolish measures in such a cause; and reasoning infidels will swallow the most absurd falsehoods with a stupid credulity! We must not impute such things to the weakness of men's understandings; but to the malice of their hearts, and to the judicial blindness to which God gives them up. Thus he leaves them to expose their own cause, and to give a constrained testimony to his truth.—But those who are teachable, and impartially seek to know the ways of God, shall be admitted to clearer and fuller discoveries of the truth, from time to time; and at length their perplexities shall be all removed, by what they see, hear, and experience in their own souls. Being then compassed with such numerous witnesses of our Redeemer's resurrection; let us ever be ready to meet him in all his appointed ordinances, for the fuller establishment of our faith and hope; and to show forth his praises, and express our admiring, joyful, grateful love, and to hold communion with him, and with his people: and let us often contemplate him, as now possessed of "all power in heaven and earth," for the benefit of his church. He has sent his gospel into this distant nation, to call us to be his disciples; and most of us have been "baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost:" let us then examine whether we really possess 'the inward and spiritual grace, of a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness,' by which 'the children of wrath' become 'the children of God.' Let us seek to experience more fully the salvation of our triune God, and to be more entirely devoted to his service and worship; and let us bring up our families, as those who desire more, far more, that they may be genuine Christians, than that they should be rich, learned, or honourable in the world. Let ministers also observe to act always under the commission, and according to the instructions, of the great "Head of the church" and "Lord of all:" let them still preach the gospel to all around them, administering sacred ordinances by the rule of the holy Scriptures; and teaching the people, not only a few doctrines, but to "observe all things whatever Christ had commanded them." He is not indeed now personally present with us, and miraculous gifts have ceased: but he is yet spiritually among us, to assist and bless us in our studies and labours, public and private: and he is and will be with all his servants and disciples "alway, even to the end of the world," and till he have gathered them all into his heavenly kingdom, to behold and share his glory and felicity. 'Even so, Lord Jesus, be thou with us, and with all thy people;' and "cause thy face to shine upon us, that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." Amen.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO

ST. MARK.

[a] C. PETER speaks of Marcus, and calls him "his son;" perhaps implying that Marcus was converted by his ministry, and served with him in the gospel. (Note, 1 Pet. 5:13.) This Marcus, or Mark, was undoubtedly the writer of the gospel on which we now enter: but whether he was, or was not, a different person from John surnamed Mark, of whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles, and in St. Paul's epistles. (Acts 12:12. 13:5,13. 15:37—39. Col. 4:10. 2 Tim. 4:11.) must remain doubtful, as the most able and laborious inquirers are divided in opinion on the subject; the celebrated Grotius taking the lead on the one side, and the indefatigable Lardner on the other.—It is, however, generally agreed, that this gospel was written under the immediate inspection of the apostle Peter, and received by the church on his authority.—'St. John had seen the three gospels, and wrote his own as a supplement to them, as plainly appears in the harmony of the gospels.... Ecclesiastical history informs us, that Mark's gospel had the approbation of Peter, and that Mark was instructed by him.... Papias conversed with the disciples of the apostles, about the beginning of the second century. He speaks of the gospels of Matthew and Mark as extant, and written by them. Justin Martyr, A. D. 150, mentions the gospels as universally received, and read in the congregations in his time. He must have conversed with Christians who were old men, and learned that the gospels were extant when they were young.... Between A. D. 70 and Justin, are the authors called apostolical, Clemens, Hermas, Barnabas, Ignatius; these make use of some of the gospels and epistles.' Jortin: Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.—'Justin Martyr ... cites passages from every one of the gospels, declaring that they contained the words of Christ.... Irenæus, in the same century, not only cites them all by name, but declares, that there were neither more nor less received by the church.... Moreover, he cites passages from every chapter of St. Matthew and St. Luke, from fourteen chapters of St. Mark, and from twenty chapters of St. John.... Tatianus, who flourished in the same century, wrote a harmony of the gospels; the gospel gathered out of the four gospels.' Whitby: Preface to the Four Gospels. It is therefore undeniable, that from the earliest ages of the church, this gospel, and that of St. Luke, though not written by apostles, were received as authentic, and as divinely inspired: and this consideration gives much weight to the tradition, that St. Peter sanctioned it by his apostolical authority, which induced the primitive church, without hesitation, to number it among the canonical books of Scripture.—Some have considered Mark, as epitomizing or abridging Matthew's gospel: and he doubtless records many of the same facts, and a few of the same discourses and parables, which are found in it. But he omits many things, and adds others; and he records some miracles much more fully than Matthew had done, and not without considerable variation: so that there is no reason to suppose, that he intentionally took any thing from Matthew, but that he wrote such things, as were especially brought to his knowledge, and impressed on his mind. The coincidence, therefore, seems to have arisen, rather from the circumstance of the two evangelists writing the history of the same grand and most highly interesting events, than from any design in the one of deducing his materials from the other. The circumstance of the same facts in many instances being repeated in this gospel, and but few of our Lord's discourses introduced, may seem to render the expositor's labour less needful, except in noting variations. But, as it has pleased God to confirm his truth by several witnesses; it will never be without use to an humble pious inquirer, to re-examine the same important transactions, as placed by each evangelist in that point of view which most affected his own mind; while the inimitable simplicity common to them all, however they vary the narrative, is an internal proof, that they were not left to be carried away by their feelings, or to use any expression unsuitable to the intrinsic dignity of the subject.

CHAPTER I.

The gospel is introduced by John the Baptist's ministry, 1—8. The baptism and temptation of Christ, 9—13. John being imprisoned, Jesus preaches in Galilee, and calls Simon and Andrew, James and John, to follow him, 14—20. He casts out an unclean spirit, 21—28; heals Peter's wife's mother, and many sick persons, 29—34; retires very early in the morning for prayer; preaches in the synagogues of Galilee; and cleanses a leper, 35—45.

THE [a]beginning of the gospel of [b]Jesus Christ, [c]the Son of God;

2 As it is [d]written in the prophets, [e]Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.

3 The [f]voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

4 John [g]did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance [*]for the [h]remission of sins.

5 And [i]there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all [k]baptized of him in the river of Jordan, [l]confessing their sins.

6 And John was [m]clothed with camels' hair, and with a girdle of a skin about his loins; and he did [n]eat locusts and wild honey;

7 And preached, saying, [o]There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose.

8 I indeed [p]have baptized you with water; but [q]he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost.

9 ¶ And it came to pass in those days, [r]that Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee, and was baptized of John in Jordan.

10 And straightway [s]coming up out of the water, he saw the heavens [t]opened, and the Spirit [u]like a dove descending upon him:

11 And [v]there came a voice from heaven, saying, [x]Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. Mark, writing after Matthew, as it is generally supposed, passed over every thing which related to the birth of Jesus, and began his history with a brief account of John the Baptist's ministry. This was in fact "The beginning of the gospel," the introduction of the New Testament dispensation; the opening of the glad tidings relating to Jesus Christ the anointed Saviour, the incarnate Son of God; according as it had been foretold by the prophets. (Marg. Ref.)—The history of John the Baptist is styled "the beginning of the gospel;" 'because he began his office by preaching repentance as the preparation to receive it, and faith in the Messiah as the subject of it. (Luke 16: 16.) ... This he styles "the gospel of the Son of God," ... that so we might have worthy thoughts both of the gospel, ... and of the Author, as being ... so nearly related to the Father.' Whitby.

Behold, &c. (2) Note, Matt. 11:7—11, v. 10.—The quotation here is exactly in the words which Matthew uses; and except the change of the pronoun my for thy, is literal from the Hebrew.—Ιδου εξαποστελλω τον αγγελον μου, και επιβλεψεται οδον προ προσωπου μου. 'Behold I will send out my messenger, and he shall look out the path before my face.' Sept. (Notes, Mal. 3:1—4. 4:4—6. Luke 1:76—79, v. 76.)

V. 3. (Notes, Is. 40:3—5. Matt. 3:1—3. Luke 1:11—17, vv. 16,17. 67—80. 3:1—6.)—'The same is called, in the foregoing clause, JEHOVAH. Therefore, as this verse is necessarily interpreted of Christ, it is an undeniable proof of his Deity, as of one substance with the Father.' Beza.—The quotation exactly as in Matthew. Instead of τας τριβους αυτου, the LXX have τας τριβους του Θεου ήμων, ("the paths of our God;") which accords to the Hebrew.

V. 4—11. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 3:4—17. Luke 3:7—9,15—18. John 1:15,19—34. 3:22—36. Acts 19:5, 6.)—Some infer, from the addition of the word "river," to the name Jordan, that St. Mark wrote especially for the use of those who were strangers to Judea.

For the remission of sins. (4) "Unto." Marg. Εις αφεσιν αμαρτιων. Notes, Luke 3:2,3, v. 3. John 1:29.—In ... Jordan. (5) Εν τω Ιορδανη. The same preposition is twice translated with, in the eighth verse, and once in the twenty-third.—The latchet, &c. (7) Τον ιμαντα, &c. Luke 3:16

12 And immediately [y]the Spirit driveth him into the wilderness.

13 And he was there in the wilderness [z]forty days [a]tempted of Satan, and was with the wild beasts: [b]and the angels ministered unto him.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ Now [c]after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, [d]preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, 15 And saying, [e]The time is fulfilled, and [f]the kingdom of God is at hand: [g]repent ye, and believe the gospel.

16 Now [h]as he walked by the sea of Galilee, he saw [i]Simon, and Andrew his brother, casting a net into the sea: for they were fishers.

17 And Jesus said unto them, Come ye after me, and I will make you to become [k]fishers of men.

18 And straightway they [l]forsook their nets, and followed him.

19 And when he had gone a little farther thence, he saw [m]James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, who also were in the ship mending their nets.

20 And straightway he called them: and [n]they left their father Zebedee in the ship with the hired servants, and went after him.

21 ¶ And [o]they went into Capernaum: and straightway on the sabbath-day [p]he entered into the synagogue, and taught.

22 And [q]they were astonished at his doctrine; for he taught them as one that had authority, and not [r]as the scribes.

23 ¶ And there was in their synagogue, [s]a man with an unclean spirit; and he cried out, 24 Saying, [t]Let us alone; what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us? I know thee who thou art, [u]the Holy One of God.

25 And Jesus [x]rebuked him, saying, Hold thy peace, and come out of him.

26 And when the unclean spirit had [y]torn him, and cried with a loud voice, he came out of him.

27 And [z]they were all amazed, insomuch that they questioned among themselves, saying, What thing is this? what new doctrine is this? [a]for with authority commandeth he even the unclean spirits, and they do obey him.

28 And immediately [b]his fame spread abroad throughout all the region round about Galilee.

[Practical Observations.]

29 ¶ And forthwith, when they were come out of the synagogue, they [c]entered into the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John.

30 But Simon's [d]wife's mother lay sick of a fever; and anon [e]they tell him of her.

31 And he came [f]and took her by the hand, and lifted her up; and immediately the fever left her, and she [g]ministered unto them.

32 ¶ And [h]at even, when the sun did set, they brought unto him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils.

33 And [i]all the city was gathered together at the door.

34 ¶ And he healed many [j]that were sick of

V. 12, 13. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 4:1—11. Luke 4:1—13.—Driveth him. (12) Εκβαλλει αυτον. (Note, Matt. 9:36—38, v. 38.) The expression may imply the energy of that impulse on the mind of our Lord, by which he was inwardly constrained to retire from society, and to go into the waste howling wilderness, to be "with the wild beasts." This last circumstance, mentioned by Mark alone, favours the opinion, that he went into that desert in which Israel formerly had wandered; and it shows the dreary situation in which he chose so long to continue, and the peculiar advantages which Satan would in that respect possess, in suggesting his horrid temptations. (Note, Matt. 4:1,2.) 'These forty days, saith Dr. Lightfoot, the holy angels ministered to Christ visibly, and Satan tempted him invisibly: at the end of them Satan puts on the appearance of an angel of light, and pretends to wait on him as they did.' Whitby. This is adduced, as one instance out of very many, in which learned men ingeniously explain passages in one gospel, without duly attending to the other gospels: for Matthew says, "Then the devil left him, and behold angels came and ministered to him." (Matt. 4:11.)

V. 14. (Notes, Matt. 4:12—17. Luke 4:14,15.) From this verse, and the parallel passages, not duly compared with the gospel of St. John, many writers have asserted, that Jesus began his ministry when John had finished his: but it is evident, that Jesus had preached, and baptized by the hands of his disciples, for a considerable time before John was imprisoned. (Notes, John 2: 3:22—36. 4:1—4.)

V. 15. 'The time fixed by the prophets, especially by Daniel's seventy weeks, has been fulfilled; and the predicted events, which have so long excited the most anxious and sanguine expectation, are on the very eve of being fulfilled.' (Notes, Gen. 49:10. Dan. 9:24—27. Hag. 2:6—9. Mal. 3:1—4.)—Repent ye, and believe the gospel.] Πιστευετε εν τω ευαγγελιω.—"Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" Matt. 4:17. Repentance would prepare the heart for a believing reception of the gospel, the glad tidings of Messiah's salvation, and this faith would certainly attend, or spring out of, true repentance. (Notes, Matt. 21:28—32. Acts 2:37—40. 3:19—21, v. 19.)

V. 16—20. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 4:18—22.) Few passages are more exactly parallel than these verses and those referred to in St. Matthew; yet, if carefully compared, (especially in the Greek,) it will be found, that they so vary, as to minute things, in several particulars, as to render it clear, that Mark did not intentionally copy Matthew.—"The hired servants," whom Zebedee had as helpers, when his sons were called to a higher employment, are not mentioned by Matthew.

V. 22. Notes, Matt. 4:23—25. 7:28,29.

V. 23—28. (Luke 4:33—37.) This miracle is not particularly recorded by Matthew.—As the possessed person was admitted into the synagogue, it may be supposed that the unclean spirit did not harass him at all times; but perhaps took advantage of the paroxysms of bodily disorder, or other circumstances, to renew his more violent assaults. Accordingly, the man was seized upon in this manner, while in the synagogue, and cried out with great vehemence, "Let us alone; what have we to do with thee," &c. Probably the man was led by Satanical influence to fear immediate destruction to himself, instead of expecting the destruction of the power of the unclean spirits, and his own deliverance from the power of Christ. (Notes, 5:2—13, v. 7. Matt. 8:28,29.) No disorder could possibly enable a man to know Jesus to be "the Holy One of God," who came "to destroy the works of the devil:" this was doubtless the language of the unclean spirit or spirits, speaking by the organs of the man; and probably intending to bring Jesus into the suspicion of a confederacy with Satan by this insidious testimony. (Note, Acts 16:16—18.) Our Lord therefore imposed silence on him, and constrained him to quit possession: and though he showed his malice, by tearing, or convulsing, the possessed person, and causing him to call out aloud as in extreme anguish; yet he so entirely left him, that the people were exceedingly astonished at the miracle; and it greatly increased and extended the reputation of Christ. 44 And saith unto him, See thou say nothing to any man: but go thy way, [c]show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing those things which Moses commanded, for a testimony unto them.

45 But he went out, [d]and began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that Jesus [e]could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places: and they came to him from every quarter.

V. 35—39. After a day spent in unremitted labours of love to a very late hour, our Lord next morning arose "a great while before day," for retirement and prayer. (Note, Luke 4:38—44, v. 42.) But after some time, Peter and some others went after him, and informed him, that all the people of the place sought for him: and it is probable, they were delighted at his increasing popularity. Yet he did not see good to go among the same people at present; but went to other places. Perhaps he knew the multitude to be meditating some design, in order to make him King over them.

V. 40—44. (Notes, Matt. 8:1—4. 9:30,31. Luke 5:12—15. 17:11—19.) It is probable, that our Lord noticed something in this man, and some others, which rendered a strict and even stern charge, in this respect, peculiarly needful, to prevent or counteract any impropriety of conduct in them, which might have given some occasion to his vigilant enemies. None but our Lord ever thus charged those who were miraculously cured, not to speak of it.—Show, &c. (44) A cleansed leper might show himself to any priest who resided in the neighbourhood, and thus have his cleansing legally attested: but it was requisite that the offerings required by the law should be presented at the sanctuary; so that, either immediately, or in a short time, this man must go up to Jerusalem for that purpose; and it is most probable, that he went to show himself to the priests at the temple, without any delay. This quotation is peculiarly important, in establishing the distinction between moral and natural inability, as showing, that the total want of inclination, or an entire aversion, forms as real an impossibility, as to the event, as a total want of physical power; but an impossibility, which in no degree interferes with our free agency, or responsibility.—'Insomuch as Jesus, who purposely shunned the confluences and applauses of the people, found it not fit for him to enter openly into the city.' *Bp. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Those characters and actions, which are for a time concealed, through obscurity or humility, are commonly far more excellent than such as are the subjects of extensive human applause: but when the Lord's time comes, or his work requires it, he makes his approved servants known, and renders their eminence equal to their excellence.—The hearts of sinful men must be prepared, before they can welcome the privileges, and perform the duties, of the kingdom of God and this is commonly effected by the divine blessing on the scriptural preaching of repentance and conversion.—Ministers should diligently perform their duty in this respect, and in administering divine ordinances; and thus numbers may be led to confess their sins, and to profess repentance: but without faith in the Saviour, through the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, they cannot be accepted servants or worshippers of God. This all faithful preachers plainly declare: and all believers speak and think humbly of themselves, and honourably of Christ, in exact proportion to the degree of their spiritual discernment and progress in the divine life: (P. O. Matt. 3:13—17. 8:5—13.) and when to this they join a holy indifference to all worldly things, they are likely to be extensively useful.—While we rejoice in the perfection of our Surety's obedience, we should copy his example: and by attending on all the ordinances of God, we shall be in the way of receiving more abundant supplies of "the Spirit of adoption," witnessing "with our spirits that we are the children of God," accepted through "his beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased." Then should we be exposed to persecutors, fierce as wild beasts, as well as to Satan's temptations, during our continuance in this wilderness; we may confide in the divine protection and consolation, and expect that angels will delight in ministering to us also, for our Redeemer's sake.

V. 14—28. One human instrument after another finishes his transient season of usefulness; but the divine Agent "worketh hitherto," and will to the end and for ever: and though apparent delays intervene, yet "when the time is fulfilled," he will "perfect what concerneth" the church and the believer, according to his holy word.—Those who are labouring, with honesty and harmony, in some mean employment, are more in the way of being called forth to further usefulness; than such as are disputing, or loitering, under pretence of study and preparation. (P. O. Ps. 78:55—72. Note, Am. 7:15—17. P. O. Matt. 4:12—25.)—The occupation of a minister, though despised by worldly men, ought to be deemed a high preferment, not only by those who may be called to it from the fishing-boat, or the flock; but even by such as should leave the highest offices in the community for the sake of it: for the salvation of one soul is a far more important event, than the temporal prosperity even of whole nations. But they "who desire this good work," must be content to forsake all worldly interests and expectations, that they may follow the example, the instructions, and the commandments of Christ; and give up themselves wholly to learn his truth and will, in order that they may teach them to others also. May his powerful word call forth many self-denied, disinterested, laborious, patient, and skilful "fishers of men:" for though many have been, and are now employed; and large numbers of sinners have been, and many still are, brought

CHAPTER II.

Jesus heals a paralytic, and shows his authority on earth to forgive sins, 1—12. He calls Matthew, and answers to use such blamed him for eating with publicans and sinners, 13—17. He vindicates his disciples, when blamed for not fasting frequently, and accused of breaking the sabbath, 18—28.

AND [a]again he entered into Capernaum after some days; [b]and it was noised that he was in the house.

2 And straightway many were gathered together, insomuch that there was no room to receive them; no, not so much as about the door: [d]and he preached the word unto them.

3 ¶ And they come unto him, [e]bringing one sick of the palsy, which was borne of four.

4 And when they could not come nigh unto him for the press, [f] they uncovered the roof where he was: and, when they had broken it up, they let down the bed wherein the sick of the palsy lay.

5 When Jesus [g]saw their faith, [h]he said unto the sick of the palsy, [i]Son, thy [k]sins be forgiven thee.

6 But there were certain of the scribes sitting there, [l]and reasoning in their hearts,

7 Why doth this man thus [m]speak blasphemies? [n]who can forgive sins, but God only?

8 And immediately, [o]when Jesus perceived in his spirit that they so reasoned within themselves, he said unto them, [p]Why reason ye these things in your hearts?

9 Whether [q]is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, [r]Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk?

10 But that ye may know [s]that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (he saith to the sick of the palsy,)

11 I say unto thee, [t]Arise, and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house.

12 And immediately he arose, took up the bed, and went forth before them all; [u]insomuch that they were all amazed, and [x]glorified God, saying, [y]We never saw it on this fashion.

forth from the course of this evil world into his church; immensely greater numbers continue in their natural estate, destroying each other, and falling a prey to that great leviathan, who takes pastime in this work of destruction.—Many scribes indeed there have been, and are, possessed of human learning, and making worldly preferment their leading object: but our prayer ought to be, that "Scribes, well instructed unto the kingdom of God," may teach "with authority," in all congregations, after the manner of Christ; and to the conviction and astonishment of such hearers as have hitherto been taught in a mere formal manner: and this would render our churches more frequented than they now generally are.—But there are too many, even in assemblies for sacred worship, who are slaves to unclean spirits: such may quietly attend, whilst only formal teachers officiate; but if the Lord come with his faithful ministers, and his holy doctrine, and by his convincing Spirit, they begin to cry out, and are ready to say, "What have we to do with thee, Jesus of Nazareth? art thou come to destroy us?" Satan indeed well knows him to be "the Holy One of God;" but he very successfully labours to hide this truth from his servants, that he may maintain and extend his empire through their ignorance and prejudice.—The immediate and perfect cure of fanatic lunatics, by a word speaking, would even in our days excite astonishment, and cause men to exclaim, "What thing is this!" Yet a work really greater is frequently wrought, and men treat it with supercilious contempt and neglect. If this were not so, the evident conversion of one notorious profligate to "a sober, righteous, and godly life," by the preaching of a crucified Saviour, would cause all around to inquire "What new doctrine is this," (new to them, though old in itself; for every thing is new to him who never heard it before,) by which unclean spirits are constrained to depart, and rebels are brought to the willing obedience of children? Indeed it is in this way, that the fame of Jesus, and the honour of the gospel, do spread abroad in this evil world: and if every one who professes the doctrines of grace, was but evidently thus dispossessed and changed, they would gradually prevail against all opposition.

V. 29—45. We ought to supplicate the Saviour for help in all our spiritual and temporal maladies, for ourselves and those belonging to us; and to use our health and strength in ministering to him and his disciples: diligently recommending him to others, as knowing that nothing is too large for his grace, or impossible to his omnipotence.—But when did any one of us spend a single day, as Jesus spent each of his days? Were we like him, we should "rise a great while before" light, (if health permitted,) rather than be straitened in time for communion with our heavenly Father, when hindered at other hours by urgent engagements: and having had a good sabbath, we should be the more earnest in prayer the next morning, lest the impression should wear off; and that we might obtain a blessing on those especially, who have heard the word of God from us, or with us.—Men may outwardly attend on instruction with diligence, and yet not be prepared to follow Christ fully: but it behooves us to use our opportunities whilst they are afforded us, that we may be established in the faith, in case we should be proved by losing them for a season.—As Christ came to preach the gospel in different places, we should endeavour to spread it on every side as we have opportunity.—Let all who are weary of the leprosy of sin, and afraid of its consequences, wait on Christ to be cleansed: for when he speaks the word, (and he will speak it, if we truly believe in him,) the most inveterate evil propensities will be brought under, and evil habits conquered, and sin shall have no more dominion over us. If this blessing be vouchsafed us, let us approve it in our conduct to the ministers and people of God, by "walking in all his ordinances and commandments," as witnesses for Christ in this evil world. Nor ought we to conceal our obligations to the Saviour: for no reasons now exist, why we should hesitate to spread abroad his praises; and the more abundantly sinners flock to him from every quarter, the greater is his honour, and the more complete his triumph and joy.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. (Note, 1:45.) As Jesus had been for some time absent from Capernaum, it is probable some of the inhabitants began to conclude that he would not return: and those who were sick, or had sick friends and relations, might fear that they had finally missed the opportunity of obtaining cures. So that the rumour of his return excited great attention, and such numbers assembled to hear his discourses, or witness his miracles, that the house and the court or space before the door, could not contain the whole company. (Marg. Ref.)

After some days. (1) Δι' ἡμερων. Probably some considerable time had elapsed.—In the house.] Εις οικον. No particular house is specified: probably it was that of Andrew and Peter.—There was no room. (2) Μηκετι χωρειν. See on Note, Matt. 19:11.

V. 3—12. (Notes, Matt. 9:2—8. Luke 5:18—26.) We find from Luke, that certain Pharisees and scribes had come from all the cities and towns, far and wide, and even from Jerusalem; doubtless to watch our Lord, and to seek for matter of accusation against him. (Luke 5:17.)—While he was earnestly instructing the people, four persons came, bringing on a bed a man so enfeebled by the palsy, that he could not be otherwise conveyed. Probably, he despaired of a cure from any other quarter, and deeply regretted that he had not applied to Jesus, when before at Capernaum; but his hope of being healed reviving on our Lord's return to that city; he was earnestly desirous of being carried to him, and his friends were equally willing to assist him; though it would be laborious to them, and painful to him. And, when they could not come into the presence of Christ, because of the multitude, being unwilling to postpone the application, lest the departure of Christ should again deprive them of the opportunity, they conveyed the bed to the top of the house. This, it may be supposed, was low, perhaps only one story high, and there was some way up on the outside: (Note, Matt. 24:15—18, v. 17.) but though there might be also an opening in the roof, yet it seems not to have been wide enough to let the bed pass through. They therefore uncovered the roof, and even broke up what was in the way. Thus they let him down through the tiling in his couch, and brought him into the presence of Jesus. Some think, judging from the sight of the houses, and acquaintance with the customs, in those eastern countries, that he was let down through the battlements, on the outside of the house, into the court-yard: but the language of the evangelists seems incapable of this meaning; and any injury done to the roof, by breaking it up, might be repaired at a small expense. When, however, Jesus "saw their faith," (in these evident effects of it, as well as by his intimate knowledge of their hearts, Marg. Ref. g,) he did not, in the first instance, remove the man's disorder; but, addressing him in the most condescending and affectionate manner, authoritatively pronounced his sins forgiven. (Marg. Ref. k.) This afforded the scribes the occasion for which they were waiting: and though they did not openly declare their sentiments; they inwardly thought him guilty of blasphemy, in presuming to do that which was the prerogative of God only. (Marg. Ref. l—n.) But our Lord soon showed them, that he possessed 13 ¶ And he went forth again [z]by the sea-side; [a]and all the multitude resorted unto him, and he taught them.

14 And as he passed by, [b]he saw Levi the son of [c]Alpheus sitting at the [d]receipt of custom, and said unto him, [d]Follow me. And he arose, and followed him.

15 And it came to pass, that, [e]as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples: for there were many, and they followed him.

16 And when the scribes and Pharisees saw him eat with publicans and sinners, they said unto his disciples, [f]How is it that he eateth and drinketh with [g]publicans and sinners?

17 When Jesus heard it, he saith unto them, [h]They that are whole have [i]no need of the physician, but they that are sick: [k]I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

18 ¶ And [l]the disciples of John and of the Pharisees used to fast: and they come and say unto him, [l]Why do the disciples of John and of the Pharisees fast, but thy disciples fast not?

19 And Jesus said unto them, [m]Can the children [n]of the bride-chamber fast, while the Bridegroom is with them? as long as they have the Bridegroom with them they cannot fast.

20 But the days will come, when [o]the Bridegroom shall [o]be taken away from them, [p]and then shall they fast in those days.

21 No man also [q]seweth a piece of [r]new cloth on an old garment; else the new piece that filled it up, taketh away from the old, and the rent [s]made worse.

22 And no man putteth new wine into old [t]bottles; else the new wine doth burst the bottles, and the wine is spilled, and the bottles will be marred: but new wine must be put into new bottles.

23 ¶ And it came to pass, [u]that he went through the cornfields on the sabbath-day; and his disciples began, as they went, [v]to pluck the ears of corn.

24 And the Pharisees said unto him, Behold, [w]why do they on the sabbath-day [x]that which is not lawful?

25 And he said unto them, [y]Have ye never read [z]what David did, when he had need, and was an hungered, he, and they that were with him?

26 How he went into [a]the house of God, in the days of [a]Abiathar the high-priest, and did eat the show-bread, [b]which is not lawful to eat but for the priests, and gave also to them which were with him?

27 And he said unto them, [c]The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath:

28 Therefore [d]the Son of man is Lord also of the sabbath.

divine perfection and authority; for "he perceived in his spirit," or by his own knowledge of their hearts, "the thoughts," or reasonings, which inwardly employed them: and he inquired, "Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk?" (Marg. Ref. o—q.) Divine authority was requisite actually to forgive sins; and omnipotence was needful for the immediate and complete removal of that terrible disorder. Having therefore put the matter upon that issue, he proved his authority as "the Son of man," even "on earth" in his state of humiliation, to forgive sins, by commanding the paralytic to arise, and take up his bed and carry it to his house: and such power accompanied his word, that the man was enabled to do this in the sight of the multitude; so that they were all astonished, gave praise to God on his behalf, and acknowledged that they had never seen it on this fashion before. (Marg. Ref. s, x, y.) Thus the man, in his miraculous cure, possessed the fullest evidence that his sins were pardoned; every one who saw him carry his bed, had a demonstration of the divine power and authority of Christ; others were encouraged to apply to him for health and Salvation, God was glorified; and the malignant scribes were put to shame and silence.—'Christ, by healing the paralytic, demonstrates, that man must by faith in him alone, recover all the strength which he has lost.' Beza.

(Marg. Ref. a. See on Note, Matt. 9:10—12.)

Sinners. (16, 17.) These "sinners" were not gentiles, as some learned men interpret the word to mean; but Jews of disgraceful character. Our Lord's ministry was almost exclusively among "the lost sheep of the house of Israel."

V. 18—22. (Notes, Matt. 9:14—17. Luke 5:33—39.) 'Superstitious and hypocritical persons rashly place the sum of piety, in things of an indifferent nature.... Not considering what the strength of each person can bear, they rashly enact any kind of laws about these things without discretion: ... and they make no distinction between the laws which God made concerning them, and laws against things in themselves unlawful. ... Ahimelech was high priest when David took the show-bread; but Abiathar, his son, was chief priest under him, and probably superintended the tabernacle and its stated concerns. Ahimelech was soon after slain; and Abiathar became high priest, and continued in that office for above forty years, till after the death of David. He was much more eminent in the history, than his father had been: and these considerations sufficiently show the evangelist's reason for inserting his name, rather than Ahimelech's, on this occasion. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Sam. 21:1—9. 22:18—22. 23:1—6. 2 Sam. 8:15—18. 1 Kings 2:26,27.)

V. 27, 28. The sabbath was originally instituted for the good of man even before the fall: (Notes, Gen. 2:2,3.) and it was continued and enforced after the fall, as still more needful for men, considered as rational agents, living in society, having many wants and troubles; the creatures and subjects of God, preparing for an eternal state of happiness or misery, and sinners under a dispensation of mercy: but "man was not made for the sabbath," as if his observance of it could be of any service to God; or as if he were required to adhere strictly to the letter of it, to his real detriment. Every regulation therefore respecting it should be interpreted according to this general rule; so that, when a strict observance of the external rest, according to the prescription, especially of the judicial or ceremonial law, would be injurious to the individual, or to others, in an enlarged and complex view of the subject; "the Lord of the sabbath," now become, by his incarnation, "the Son of man," has granted him a license to dispense with it; but not on any other account. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Violent sickness and the fear of death, when united to some hope of recovery, and an apprehension that the opportunity may speedily elapse, render men willing to use various irksome and painful methods of cure; and the failure of one remedy commonly renders them more eager to make trial of another. This indeed is not to be blamed: on the contrary, we should put ourselves to inconveniences and hardship, in attempting the relief of the afflicted and diseased: but it is most to be desired, that their afflictions may bring them to Christ for the salvation of their souls, as well as for a blessing on the means used to recover bodily health.

CHAPTER III.

Jesus restores a man's withered hand in the synagogue, on the sabbath, 1—6. The Phar sees conspire his death: he retires, is followed by multitudes, and heals many, 6—12. He chooses twelve apostles, 13—19. His friends look upon him as beside himself, 20, 21. He confutes the blasphemous absurdity of the scribes, who ascribe his casting out devils to the power of Beelzebub, 22—30. Those who do the will of God are regarded as his nearest relations, 31—35.

AND [a]he entered again into the synagogue: and there was a man there which had [b]a withered hand.

2 And [c]they watched him, whether he would heal him on the sabbath-day; that they might accuse him.

3 And [d]he saith unto the man which had the withered hand, Stand forth.

4 And he saith unto them, [e]Is it lawful to do good on the sabbath-days, or to do evil? to save life, or to kill? [f]But they held their peace.

5 And when he had looked round about on them [g]with anger, being [h]grieved for the [i]hardness of their hearts, he saith unto the man, [j]Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it out: and his hand was restored whole as the other.

6 ¶ And [k]the Pharisees went forth, and straightway took counsel with the [l]Herodians against him, how they might destroy him.

7 But [m]Jesus withdrew himself with his disciples to the sea: [n]and a great multitude from [o]Galilee followed him, and from Judea, for in that case their afflictions will certainly be either removed or sanctified. Forgiveness of sins, being the forerunner of all other real blessings, is far more valuable than the removal of any sickness; and the loss of the soul is infinitely more dreadful, than the death of the body: but how very few act as if they believed these undeniable truths!—(Notes. Ps. 32:1,2. Matt. 10:28,29.) We cannot deliver our fellow-sinners from the maladies of the body, much less from those of the soul: but we may in various ways, be helpful in bringing them to Christ for salvation; and should lose no opportunity, and shrink from no self-denial, in attempting it.—The humbled sinner, who despairs of all help, except from the Saviour, will evince his faith by seeking to him, with all earnestness and without delay; and difficulties will only serve to increase his diligence and resolution. He will not attempt to heal himself, or expect to become better, before he comes to his Physician; but when he receives the blessing of forgiveness, it is accompanied by such a powerful operation of renewing grace on his soul, that he evidently becomes "a new creature; old things pass away, behold all things become new!" (Notes, Rom. 6:1,2. 2 Cor. 5:17. Eph. 2:4—10, v. 10. Heb. 6:9,10.) When enabled to overcome those evils to which he was before enslaved, and to delight in those duties which he had been incapable of, or had an aversion to, he has "a witness in himself," that he is pardoned and justified in Christ Jesus: for he, who heals the distempered soul, must also have power to cleanse the guilty conscience; and the former is the seal and attestation of the latter.—Whatever proud Pharisees and scribes may say in their hearts, or with their lips, against such instances of our Redeemer's power and grace, the happy change is often so evident, that it cannot be gainsayed: and all impartial judges must see and own, in the conduct of many who profess the gospel, a demonstration of the excellency of the doctrines, and of the efficacy of the grace, which they have received. But if any think, however confidently, that their sins are forgiven, who still remain under the power of their corrupt passions and habits, they deceive themselves and bring a scandal on the gospel; for Christ is glorified in those alone who glorify him by their conduct, from the time when they profess to believe in his name. Should any assume to forgive sins, who have no power to cure paralytics, and to bid them "take up their bed and walk;" they would be justly chargeable with the most presumptuous blasphemy: but the feeblest believer may attempt such things at Christ's command, as otherwise would be impossible to him; for his word is with power, and he will strengthen the willing soul to yield obedience to it. (P. O. Matt. 9:1—8. John 5:1—14.)

V. 13—28. While the faithful servants of Christ, after his example, call on publicans and sinners to forsake all and follow him, and meet with some success in their labour of love; there are many who accuse them of encouraging vice, and of being enemies to morality and goodness: not understanding that "Christ came, not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." The divine Redeemer himself did not escape such slanders; and we should therefore be willing to bear them, as well as careful not to deserve them. If we be blamed for omitting such things as are not needful or seasonable, or for doing that which is not sinful, we may quietly leave him to plead our cause. But we should attend to every part of our duty, in its proper order and season: and ministers should be cautious, in dealing with the weak but conscientious, that they may not discourage them. They should insist on the habitual practice of all holiness, the observance of the Lord's day, and the attendance on divine ordinances, in subserviency to their real good and that of others: but not be so exact in minute or doubtful externals, as to interfere with the grand concerns of genuine piety, justice and charity; or with any thing which may glorify God, or do good to men. (P. O. Matt. 9:9—17.)

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1—5. (Notes, 2:23—28. Matt. 12:9—13.) When Christ demanded, "whether it was lawful to do good, or evil, on the sabbath-day; to save life, or to kill;" he referred to the secret intentions of the scribes and Pharisees to compass his death. While they were forming designs of perpetrating the most atrocious murder from the basest motives, in the synagogue, and on the sabbath-day; they blamed him for doing good, and saving men's lives on that day, even when done in subserviency to the salvation of their souls also! Their malice and perverseness therefore excited his holy indignation: but their exposedness to misery, through the hardness and blindness of their hearts, caused him also to grieve over them, as well as for the mischief which they did to the people.—Stand forth. (3) "Arise into the midst."

Is it lawful, &c. (4) It seems from St. Matthew's narrative, that the enemies of Christ first "asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath-days?" and that he answered them by the question here stated. 'Hence it seems to follow, that he who doth not do good to his neighbour when he can, doeth evil to him; it being a want of charity, and therefore evil, to neglect any opportunity of doing good, or showing kindness to any man in misery; and that not to preserve life when it is in danger, is to transgress the precept which saith, "Thou shalt not kill."' Whitby. (Note, 1 John 3:16,17.)

Anger. (5) 'Hence we learn, that anger is not always sinful; this passion being found in him in whom was no sin. But then it must be noted, that anger is not properly defined by philosophers, ορεξις αντιλυπησεως, a desire of revenge, or causing grief to him who hath provoked, or hath grieved us; for this desire of revenge is always evil: and though our Saviour was angry with the Pharisees for the hardness of their hearts; yet he had no desire to revenge this sin upon them, but had a great compassion for them.' Whitby.—Our Lord's anger was not only not sinful, but it was a holy indignation, a perfectly right state of heart; and the want of it would have been a sinful defect. It would show a want of filial respect and affection, for a son to hear, without emotion, his father's character unjustly aspersed. Would it not then be a want of due reverence for God, to hear his name blasphemed, without feeling and expressing an indignant disapprobation? Vengeance belongs to the ruler exclusively: and he may grieve at the necessity imposed on him of thus expressing his disapprobation of crimes; but it is his duty. Eli ought to have shown anger, as well as grief, when informed of the vile conduct of his sons; and to have expressed it by severe coercive measures. (Notes, 1 Sam. 2:23—34. 3:11—14.) Thus parents and masters, as well as magistrates, may sin, in not feeling and expressing just displeasure against those under their care: and anger is only sinful, when it springs from selfishness and malevolence; when causeless or above the cause; and when expressed by unhallowed words and actions. (Notes, Matt. 5:21,22. Eph. 4:26,27.)

V. 6—12. (Note, Matt. 12:14—21, v. 14.) Took counsel. (6) Συμβουλιον εποιουν. "Made a consultation," or "a council," (Συμβουλιον ελαβον, Matt. 12:14.) The combination of the leaders of the different sects, convening together, as in council, against Jesus, seems intended.—From Judea, &c. (7,8) Marg. Ref. o—r. Should wait on him. V. 13—19. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 10:1—4.) This appointment of the twelve apostles seems to have occurred some time before they were sent forth to preach. (6:7—12.) Jesus chose them "to be with him," that his daily instructions, conversation, and devotions might prepare them for their most important work.—The surname of "Boanerges" or, "sons of thunder," given to James and John, doubtless related to the energy and efficacy with which they addressed men's consciences, to awaken their fears, and to show them their need of mercy and salvation. (Notes, Jer. 23:28,29. Heb. 4:12,13.) 'Christ seems to have given them this name, from a foresight of the heat and zeal of their temper, of which they quickly gave an instance, in their desire to call down fire from heaven ... to consume the Samaritans. (Luke 9:54.) ... Hence we find in the Acts of the Apostles Peter and John are the chief speakers and actors in the defence and propagation of the gospel: and the zeal of James and Peter seems to be the reason, why the one was slain by Herod, and the other imprisoned, in order to the like execution.' Whitby. It is evident, that John, as well as James, was naturally of a warm and sanguine disposition: but when this was greatly sanctified, it constituted that fervent, zealous, and affectionate temper, which appears in his writings. Yet numbers, who speak of his loving spirit, (I suppose, because he so much inculcates love,) as if he had been more lenient indulgent, and incapable of giving pain by sharp reproofs and awful warnings, than the other apostles, seem to have totally mistaken his character: for no part of the Scripture is more suited to give offence to all hypocritical professors of Christianity, than his first epistle; or even to put inconsistent or negligent Christians to a stand, and make them question their own sincerity.

Simon the Canaanite. (18) "Simon called Zelotes," Luke 6:15. Κανανιτην, derived from the Hebrew root קנא, to be zealous. Χανανιτης signifying a native of Canaan, begins with χ not κ. Matt. 15:22. Acts 7:11. 13:19.

V. 20, 21. After Jesus had appointed the apostles, they went into a house: but the multitude assembled so speedily, that they had no time to take refreshment; yet our Lord proceeded to instruct them. His friends, or "kinsmen," (marg.) therefore, deemed him to be too far transported by zeal; and such of them, as did not believe him to be "the Son of God," concluded that he was "beside himself," and that he exceeded all bounds of moderation and prudence: they therefore sought to lay hold on him, and, either by importunity or compulsion, to prevail with him to desist from his excessive labours. (Note, 31—35.)—Many objections indeed have been made to this translation and interpretation: yet I can have no doubt, that it is the real meaning of the passage. Some of Christ's relations or acquaintance might think him "beside himself," for the same reason that Festus and others did St. Paul; and in their natural affection for him, might purpose to use compulsion, if persuasions would not prevail with him to desist: and even his more pious relatives might possibly be anxious for his health, and judge his labours to be indiscreet, and so concur in the design: for it is thought by many, on very probable grounds, that he had watched all the preceding night, and been laboriously employed all the former part of the day. (Luke 6:12—19.)

He is beside himself. (21) Εξεστι. See on 2:12.—'He is fainty, or may fall into a deliquium by spending thus his spirits. Gen. 42:28. 45:26. Josh. 2:11. Is. 7:2. 33:3. Sept. Whitby. It does not, however, appear, that any symptoms of fainting were discernible in Jesus; and the present, not what might be feared as to the future, is evidently intended.

V. 22—30. Notes, Matt. 12:22—32. Luke 11:14—26.—Parables. (23) The instances of a kingdom, and a family, divided against themselves, constituted distinct parables, illustrating the subject under consideration.—Forgiven, &c. (28) They are pardonable, and in some instances are forgiven. The expression, "in danger of eternal damnation," (29) signifies "exposed to eternal damnation." (See on Matt. 5:22.)

V. 31—35. (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. Luke 8:19—21.)—There is scarcely any difference in the import of the passage from that in Matthew; but he who bestows the pains to compare the words of the two evangelists, must be convinced, that the one did not intend to copy from the other. Marg. Ref.)

His mother. (31) 'Hence Theophylact taxes her ... o

32 And the multitude sat about [a]him; and they said unto him, Behold, thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee.

33 And he answered them, saying, [b]Who is my mother, [c]or my brethren?

34 And he looked round about on them which sat about him, and said, [d]Behold my mother and my brethren!

35 For whosoever shall [e]do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother.

CHAPTER IV.

The parable of the sower, 1—9. Why Christ taught by parables, 10—13. The interpretation of the parable, 14—20. Knowledge is given in order to be communicated, 21, 22. A call to hear with attention, 23—25. The parable of seed sown, imperceptibly growing up, and ripening for harvest, 26—29; that of the grain of mustard-seed, 30—32. Christ teaches only by parables, which he expounds to his disciples, 33, 34. He stills a tempest by his word, 35—41.

AND [a]he began again to teach by the sea-side: and there was gathered unto him a great multitude, [b]so that he entered into a ship, and sat in the sea; and the whole multitude was by the sea on the land.

2 And he taught them many things [c]by parables, and said unto them [d]in his doctrine,

3 [e]Hearken; Behold, [f]there went out a sower to sow:

4 And it came to pass, as he sowed, some fell by the way-side, [g]and the fowls of the air came and devoured it up.

5 And some fell on [h]stony ground, where it had not much earth, and immediately it sprang up, because it had no depth of earth:

6 But when [i]the sun was up, it was scorched; and because it had [k]no root it withered away.

7 And some [l]fell among thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked it, and it yielded no fruit.

8 And other [m]fell on good ground, and did yield fruit that sprang up, and increased, and brought forth, some thirty, and some sixty, and some [n]an hundred.

9 And he said unto them, [o]He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

10 ¶ And [p]when he was alone, they that were about him, with the twelve, asked of him the parable.

11 And he said unto them, [q]Unto you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto [r]them that are without, [s]all these things are done in parables:

12 That [t]seeing they may see, and not perceive, and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should [u]be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them.

13 And he saith unto them, [x]Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?

14 The [y]sower soweth [z]the word.

15 And [a]these are they by the way-side, where the word is sown; but, when they have heard, vain glory and of guilt, in endeavouring to draw him ... from eaching the word. Tertullian pronounceth her guilty of inredulity: Chrysostom, of vain glory, infirmity, and madness, for this very thing.' Whitby.—It is plain, that many of these intimations were suited, and doubtless prophetically intended, to be a scriptural protest against the idolatrous honour to this day by vast multitudes rendered to Mary, the mother of Jesus. She was, no doubt, an excellent and honourable character, but evidently not perfect: she is entitled to great estimation and high veneration; but surely not to religious confidence and worship. (Notes, Luke 2:41—52. John 2:1—5.) —My mother, &c. (35) Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 25:34—40. Luke 11:27,28. John 19:25—27.—The instruction conveyed most emphatically and affectionately, in this observation of our Lord, that we also should consider all, whom we candidly judge to be obedient believers in him, as his brethren, sisters, and mother, and to act towards them as such in all their wants, sorrows, and difficulties for his sake, is generally far too much overlooked, both by readers and expositors; and far too seldom, or too slightly pressed home to the hearts and consciences of professed Christians, who are stewards of this world's good things.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19. Acts of mercy and charity can never be unseasonable; for it is as lawful "to do good" to man, as it is proper to attend on the worship of God on the Lord's day. But selfish and malicious men, who are projecting wickedness in the midst of formal or ostentatious devotion, are most prone to censure those good works, which they will not mitate: and they are especially glad to find something to condemn in those who are labouring to promote the salvation of souls, and to show the vanity of their assumed appearances of religion.—While we steadily persevere in doing good, notwithstanding opposition, we may properly express an indignant abhorrence of wickedness; but it should be connected with compassion for the persons of opposers, and earnest desires of their salvation.—We shall commonly find, that the rage and enmity of proud enemies will increase, in proportion as the power and grace of Christ are glorified; and that unbelievers, of the most opposite sentiments and characters, will combine against the cause of evangelical godliness: but if we be at any time compelled to retire from their persecuting rage, we ought to seek for other scenes and opportunities of usefulness.—What multitudes thronged after Jesus, to hear his word, behold his miracles, and share the beneficent effects of them! Yet how few in comparison were willing to avow their relation to him, when the time of his sufferings arrived! He knew that it would be so, and could form a proper estimate of their inconstancy: but we should be upon our guard; for popular applause and favour are very dangerous, and are no more to be trusted than the deceitful calm of the unstable ocean.—All our sicknesses and calamities spring from the anger of God against sin; and the removal of them, or the sanctifying blessing on them for the good of our souls, was purchased for us by the sufferings of Christ. But the plagues and maladies of our hearts are chiefly to be deprecated: he can cure these also by a touch or a word; and unclean spirits, knowing him to be "the Son of God," are still constrained to obey him. May increasing numbers press to be healed of these plagues, and delivered from these enemies: may he send forth more and more of such as have "been with him," and have learned from him to preach his gospel, and to be his instruments in this blessed work: may all his ministers be "Boanerges, sons of thunder," to speak his word with energy and efficacy; and may no Judas be found among those who presume to declare his sacred truths!

V. 20—35. If we were as earnest as our Lord, and "instant in season and out of season, in preaching the word," in prayer, and in every good work; we should count no hour improper, no situation inconvenient, for these labours of love: but we also should find, that our carnal or injudicious friends would be ready to deem us "beside ourselves," and would use all their influence to moderate our ardour, and lessen our diligence. Prudence indeed is necessary and commendable; but it is extremely apt to degenerate into lukewarmness, indolence, and timidity: and zeal like that of Christ, will seldom escape the charge of being excessive and indiscreet, from the more decent part of mankind, or even from professors of the gospel, who can scarcely conceive, that invisible and future things require more earnestness, than our most important temporal concerns. (Note, 2 Kings 9:11.) But proud and malignant enemies will not stop here: they will impute the most beneficial effects to the basest motives or causes; and maintain that men are doing Satan's work, acting under his influence, and opposing every thing good, when sinners are evidently brought to repentance and to newness of life. But let them beware how they ascribe the operations of the Holy Ghost to the power of the devil, or how they deride and revile them: for in so doing they may be guilty of such blasphemy, as shall never find forgiveness, but expose them to eternal damnation. Let the servants of Christ go on with their work, in dependence on his power, and avoiding all contentions with each other, which only weaken the common cause: then they will have an almighty Helper ready to overcome their strong enemy, and to deliver sinners from his hateful dominion. And let all those who hear, believe, and obey the Saviour, according to the will of God the Father, rejoice and glory in their relation to him, who will assuredly own every one of them, "as his brother, his sister or his mother:" and conduct themselves towards all their fellow Christians, however mean, or however they in some things differ from them, as they would behave, or ought to behave, to Christ himself, if visibly present on earth, [b]Satan cometh immediately, and taketh away the word that was sown in their hearts.

16 And these are they likewise [c]which are sown on stony ground; who, when they have heard the word, immediately receive it with gladness;

17 And [d]have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time: afterward, [e]when affliction or persecution ariseth for the word's sake, immediately they are offended.

18 And these are they [f]which are sown among thorns; such as hear the word, 19 And [g]the cares of this world, and [h]the deceitfulness of riches, [i]and the lusts of other things, entering in, choke the word, and it becometh [k]unfruitful.

20 And these are they [l]which are sown on good ground; such as hear the word, and receive it, and bring forth fruit, some thirty-fold, some sixty, and some [m]an hundred.

21 ¶ And he said unto them, [n]Is a candle brought to be put under a [o]bushel, or under a bed? and not to be set on a candlestick?

22 For [p]there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested; neither was any thing kept secret, but that it should come abroad.

23 If [q]any man have ears to hear, let him hear.

24 And he saith unto them, [r]Take heed what ye hear: [s]with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you: and unto you that [t]hear shall more be given.

25 For [u]he that hath, to him shall be given: and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath. [Practical Observations.]

26 ¶ And he said, [v]So is the kingdom of God, [x]as if a man should cast seed into the ground;

27 And should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring [y]and grow up, he knoweth not how.

28 For [z]the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; [a]first the [b]blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear.

29 But when the fruit is [†]brought forth, immediately [c]he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come.

in precisely the same circumstances: and this as they hope to meet him with confidence and joy at the day of judgment.

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—20. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 13:1—23. Luke 8:4—15.) 'See, saith Theophylact, now rare are good men, and how few are saved! for only the fourth part of the seed fell on good ground and was preserved. Observe here also the gradation. The seed sown in the high way comes not up at all; the seed sown upon stony ground comes up, but increaseth not; the seed sown among thorns increaseth, but bears no fruit; the seed sown on good ground, brings forth fruit to perfection.' Whitby.

They that were about, &c. (10) Such as more constantly attended on Christ, as his disciples, along with his apostles.—To them that are without. (11) 'It was customary to the Jews to give this title to the heathens: our Saviour, therefore, by applying it to them, seems to hint, that in a short time the kingdom of God would be taken from them; and they themselves would be ... "them that were without."' Whithy. (Notes, 1 Cor. 5:9—13, v. 13. Col. 4:5,6. 1 Thes. 4:9—12, v. 12. 1 Tim. 3:7.)—Their sins should be forgiven them. (12) "That I should heal them," Matt. 13:15. The quotation, if intended as such, varies more from the LXX, than that in Matthew. (Note, Is. 6:9,10.)—How then, &c. (13) Our Lord here gently reproved the dulness of his disciples, whose minds were in a measure obscured by those prejudices and carnal expectations, with which the unbelieving Jews were entirely blinded; and he intimated, that, as he had many things to teach in parables, they ought to apply their minds to the attentive consideration of them, that they might be able to explain them to others also.—Lusts of other things. (19) Anxious cares in the poor, and deceitful riches in the wealthy, are peculiarly unfavourable to religious improvement: but the eager desire and pursuit of any earthly object has the same effect, whatever a man's outward circumstances may be.—This addition to the parable, as delivered by St. Matthew, with very many other variations, (more than could be conceived, without accurately comparing the evangelists together in the original,) demonstrate that St. Mark was no copier of St. Matthew, even when he recorded the same actions, miracles, and discourses.—No seed, except "the word of God," "the word of the kingdom," produces any genuine fruit: for the regenerating and sanctifying grace of God attends no instruction of another kind, which alone can make the heart of fallen man "good ground," and "give the increase:" (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) and when this "good seed" does not yield fruit; the fault lies in the ground alone. "They had no root in themselves."

V. 21, 22. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 5:14—16. 6:22,23. 10:24—28.) These verses were intended to call the attention of the disciples to the word of Christ. By thus instructing them, he meant to qualify them to be the instructers of others; as candles are lighted, not to be covered, but to be placed on a candlestick, that they may give light to the room. The meaning of his parables and discourses, though at that time concealed from the people, was afterwards to be manifested and spread abroad, in the most extensive and perspicuous manner. 'These words being only spoken to Christ's disciples, when he was alone with them, and both here and in Luke 8:16,17, subjoined to the explication of this parable, I think it best to explain them accordingly; as if Christ had said, I give you a clear light, by which you may discern the import of this and other parables: but this I do, not that you may keep it to yourselves, and hide it from others, but that it may be beneficial to you, and by you be made beneficial to others. ... And though I give you the knowledge of "these mysteries of the kingdom of God" ... privately; I do it not that you may keep them so: for "there is nothing (thus) hid, which should not be made manifest;" neither was any thing made secret, (by me,) but that it should (afterwards) come abroad. ... Had Christ's apostles so obscurely delivered or writ the gospels, and those other Scriptures which contain the rule of faith, even in things necessary to be believed or done unto salvation, as the Romanists pretend they did; they must have hid this "candle under a bushel," and not have manifested it to the world, as Christ here requires them to do. Whitby. (Note, 2 Cor. 3:12—16.)

V. 23—25. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Luke 8:16—18. Heb. 2:1—4. Rev. 2:6,7.) The apostles (and indeed all who heard, or read these words) were exhorted to bow their ears, and apply their minds attentively, to the words of Christ: to take heed "what they heard," and "how they heard" it; that they might receive in faith and love the truth alone, and all of it; and that they might impart it to others, as well as adorn it by their own lives. For, according to their faithfulness, and correspondent conduct, as his ministers, or the contrary, they would at length be dealt with: and more knowledge, wisdom, and spiritual gifts would be given to those of them, who heard the word in obedient faith and with humble attention; according to that general rule of his kingdom, which we have repeatedly considered. (Notes, Matt. 13:12. 25:24—30, v. 29.)

V. 26—29. This parable, which is not found in any other gospel, represents the manner in which the kingdom of God gains ground in the world. In this respect, he who faithfully and diligently preaches "the word of the truth of the gospel," may be likened to a husbandman, who sows his seed with suitable care and attention, and then leaves it. Accordingly, he sleeps by night, and rises in the morning to attend on his other business; not being solicitous about the seed, as if the increase depended on his constant attention. In the mean time it springs up, and by imperceptible degrees grows to maturity; and he is so far from managing the process, that he does not comprehend it: for the earth, made fruitful by the Creator's power and goodness, and receiving the influence of the sun, rain, and varying seasons, as ordered by him, spontaneously produces the increase. A small blade first appears, and, during the changes of the weather, it sometimes appears more flourishing, and at others seems to wither: yet at length it ears, fills, and ripens; and the husbandman gathers in the crop, which God has given him as the increase of his seed sown. (Marg. and Marg Ref.)—Thus faithful preachers sow "the good seed of the word," and use the other appointed means of obtaining success; "but God alone gives the increase." When they have the opportunity of watching the effects of their own labours, they find their hopes and fears continually fluctuate, they meet with disappointments which they can by no means prevent, and success where they had almost given up the hope of it; but much of the good done will generally be unknown at the time, and perhaps become visible after their death. However, the labour of that man, who is faithful and diligent, will not be in vain: the seed finds some hearts prepared by the preventing grace of God to 30 ¶ And he said, [d]Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? or with what comparison shall we compare it?

31 It is [e]like a grain of mustard-seed, which, when it is sown in the earth, [f]is less than all the seeds that be in the earth:

32 But when it is sown, it groweth up, and becometh greater than all herbs, and [g]shooteth out great branches; so that the fowls of the air may [h]lodge under the shadow of it.

33 And [i]with many such parables spake he the word unto them, [k]as they were able to hear it.

34 But without a parable spake he not unto them: and [l]when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples.

35 ¶ And [m]the same day, when the even was come, he saith unto them, [n]Let us pass over unto the other side.

36 And when they had sent away the multitude they took him, [o]even as he was in the ship: and there were also with him other little ships.

37 And [p]there arose a [q]great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship, so that it was now full.

38 And he was [r]in the hinder part of the ship, asleep on a pillow: [s]and they awake him, and say unto him, Master, [t]carest thou not that we perish?

39 And [u]he arose, and [x]rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm.

40 And he said unto them, [y]Why are ye so fearful? how is it that ye have [z]no faith?

41 And they [a]feared exceedingly, and said one to another, [b]What manner of man is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?

receive it: under the influences of the Spirit it springs up; and from convictions of sin and inquiries after salvation, it grows up into a more solid judgment, deeper experience and humility, and greater simplicity; and thus proceeds to increasing fruitfulness in good works. In this manner, souls are prepared for heaven: and when their measure of services and trials are completed, and they are made ready for the glory and felicity intended for them; the Lord will gather them as the wheat of his harvest into his garner: and they, who have been the instruments of their conversion and sanctification, will at last glorify God for the blessed increase of their patient labours, which perhaps at the time they concluded to be almost entirely unsuccessful. (Note, John 4:35—38.)—God, by his ministers, sows the seed; and he by ministering angels gathers in the harvest. (Notes, Matt. 13:36—43. 1 Cor. 3:4—9.)

V. 33, 34. Our Lord taught the people in that manner which was most suited to their state of mind. They were too much prejudiced to receive and profit by such plain declarations of doctrinal truth, as his apostles afterwards made: but his parables, without giving needless offence, or affording his enemies any advantage, were calculated to excite inquiries, and to prepare the way for fuller and more particular instructions, when the proper season arrived. And he privately expounded all to his disciples; and so prepared the way for that "great plainness of speech," which he intended that they should use. (*Marg. V. 35—41. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 8:23—27.) All the parables contained in this chapter, and in the thirteenth of Matthew, seem to have been spoken during the remainder of that day, on which the friends of Jesus were dissatisfied with his unwearied and zealous labours: (Notes, 3:20,21,31—35.) yet, having persisted in them till the evening, he put to sea, even "as he was," in the ship whence he had preached, and without any peculiar attention to his health, ease, or indulgence, after so great fatigues! Such an example did he set us of enduring hardship, and avoiding all needless regard to ourselves, whilst employed in doing good to the souls of men! (Note, Phil. 2:24—30.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—25. While we lament, that so few of the human species are instructed, according to the pure gospel of Christ; and that so large a majority of those who are thus favoured, derive no real benefit from it; let us "look to ourselves," and to our own hearts, that they be not as fallow ground, or "the way-side," through carelessness and inattention.—Satan, that "wicked one," is ever active and vigilant, in preventing the success of the gospel: and if men do not immediately secure what they have heard, by meditation, prayer, faith, and obedience; he will immediately take it away from their hearts and memories. Nor will any impressions be durable, which are not deep: the heart, that is not broken, humbled, and changed, will not be made fruitful; and superficial convictions or affections, and that profession which springs from them, will gradually vanish: this will especially be evident when "persecution and affliction arise because of the word." We cannot be real Christians, if we "have not that root in ourselves," which would withstand the most scorching sun of persecution, should it fall upon us: but many prove, even in the most quiet times, how they would act in more trying circumstances, while "the cares of the world, the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things, choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful." Let us then earnestly beseech the Lord, that, by his new-creating grace, our hearts may become "good ground;" and that the good seed of the word may produce a large increase in our lives, of all those good words and works, "which are through Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God." Thus will it appear, that "to us it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God:" while numbers know it not, because of the pride, unbelief, and carnality of their hearts; and so, being given up by God, "they see, but do not perceive; they hear, but do not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins be forgiven them."—Unless we understand this parable of the sower, which is so plain and universally interesting, how shall we understand all those parables, under which divine mysteries are couched? Let us then attend more diligently to instruction, and pray for a humble, teachable disposition, and for the illumination of the Holy Spirit: for we are called to "shine as lights" in this dark world: and though our light is only as the feeble glimmering of a candle, compared with the splendour of "the Sun of righteousness;" yet we may hope to receive from him, and to communicate to others, some rays of heavenly wisdom: provided we do not put our candle under a bushel, but endeavour to let it shine before men, in our profession of the truth, and a conversation consistent with it.—Though no human teaching can make "the natural man receive the things of the Spirit of God;" yet it is our business to make known the great truths of the gospel, according to the duties of our respective stations. But, as so many discordant doctrines are propagated on every side; it is incumbent on us to take heed what, as well as how, we hear. If we believe, obey, and impart to others, the blessed truths of Scripture, all blessings will be measured to us in great abundance: but wo be to those who reject, corrupt, or conceal the light, which Christ came into the world to diffuse among mankind! for all their earthly possessions, admired abilities, and valuable opportunities, shall be taken from them; and they will be left to eternal contempt, poverty and misery.

V. 26—41. In endeavouring to promote the kingdom of God, we should rest satisfied with having done our part, and wait in patient hope on God, that he may do his also: for he reserves to himself the power of giving the increase; and he does it in an incomprehensible manner, that he may secure the whole honour of it to his own great name. We should, therefore, bear up against discouragement, though we do not yet perceive much success in our labours. We ought indeed

10 And [p]he besought him much that he would not send them away out of the country.

11 Now there was there, nigh unto the mountains, a great [q]herd of swine feeding.

12 And [r]all the devils besought him, saying Send us into the swine, that we may enter into them.

13 And forthwith Jesus [s]gave them leave. And the unclean spirits went out, and entered into the swine; and [t]the herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, (they were about two thousand,) and were choked in the sea. [Practical Observations.]

14 And [u]they that fed the swine fled, and told it in the city, and in the country. And they went out to see what it was that was done.

15 And they come to Jesus, and see [x]him that was possessed with the devil, and had the legion, sitting, and clothed, and in his right mind; [y]and they were afraid.

16 And they that saw it, told them how it befell to him that was possessed with the devil, and also concerning the swine.

17 And they began [z]to pray him to depart ou of their coasts.

18 And when he was come into the ship, he that had been possessed with the devil [a]prayed him that he might be with him.

to redouble our diligence, and become more fervent in prayer; but, however anxious, we cannot make the seed grow, nor understand why it springs up in one case, and not in another. The effects we may often see, but the cause and method of operation we cannot comprehend. Let us then go on with our work, in cheerful assurance that "in due season we shall reap, if we faint not:" and let us seek unto the Lord to give the increase, wherever the word is preached; and pray, that all Christians may "grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ Jesus," and daily ripen for the glorious harvest.—We should not despise feeble beginnings, either in individuals, or in the diffusing of the light of divine truth in dark places; as "the kingdom of heaven is like the grain of mustard-seed," and as great consequences often spring from feeble causes and instruments.—These things will not be obvious to others, but Christ will expound them to his disciples: and if we follow him closely, he will afford us his special presence; and he will teach us self-denial by his precepts and his example.—Storms may indeed assail us, and our fears may be great: but faith will apply to him for help, and meet no disappointment. Even, when he seems to slumber, he restrains the violence of the winds and waves, and the fury of wicked men and apostate spirits: and when he awakes for our help, he will speak every tempest into a calm, and turn all our terrors into adoring love and gratitude. But, while "he careth for us, that we perish not," he will rebuke our unbelief: and indeed our excessive fears, in little difficulties and dangers, sometimes seem to indicate that we have almost no faith; notwithstanding all that we have heard, witnessed, and experienced, of his power, truth, and love, who is "the mighty God and the Prince of peace," and who "never faileth those who trust in him."—Instead therefore of dreading outward dangers, to the dishonour of the Lord; let us reverently, fully, and thankfully adore him, whom "even the winds and seas obey."

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1. (Mat. 8:28.) The region of the Gergesenes was of larger extent than that of the Gadarenes, which was included in it.

V. 2—13. (Notes, Matt. 8:28,29. Luke 8:26—39.) St. Matthew gives a brief account of two demoniacs, who were dispossessed on this occasion: but Mark and Luke omit the mention of one of them, (who was not, perhaps, so remarkable either before or after his cure,) to record that of the other more fully. Many circumstances therefore here require more particular consideration.—It is probable, that our Lord had landed, intentionally, near the place where the demoniac wandered, and was immediately met by him. He was possessed "with an unclean spirit," or a fallen spirit, impure and unholy, and an enemy to the authority of God, in whose judgment all sin is uncleanness, and "filthiness of flesh or spirit." (Note, 2 Cor. 7:1.) The words, "unclean spirits," and "demons," are used as synonymous. (12,13.) Though many evil spirits possessed the man, one is first mentioned, who may be considered as the ruler of the company. The force, which they exerted by the limbs of the man, was so great, that his friends could by no means confine him; for he had repeatedly broken even the fetters and chains with which he had been bound, and was so fierce that none could tame or subdue him. He was therefore left to wander, night and day, without clothes, among the solitary tombs, and on the mountains; where he cried hideously, as one in excessive anguish, and cut himself with stones, by running among them, lying down naked, or in a frantic manner. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, Dan. 4:28—33.) Thus was he most wretched in himself, the grief of all his friends, and the terror and nuisance of the neighbourhood: an apt emblem of the more desperate "children of disobedience," in whom Satan reigns and works without control. Yet, as soon as Jesus appeared, he came and prostrated himself before him in the posture of a worshipper; (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 3:6—12, v. 11.) and the unclean spirit, which spake by the man's organs of speech, earnestly entreated and adjured him by God, (who had respited them from torment for a time, and given them permission to tempt and harass the sinful race of men,) that he would not consign them immediately to the place of punishment; nor even drive them out of that region, where they had, it seems, hitherto continued unmolested. The permission asked and obtained of entering into the swine, and the effects of that permission, in the destruction of the swine, have been already considered. (Note, Matt. 8:30—32.) But we here further learn, that our Lord demanded of the spirit which spake to him, what his name was: to which he answered, that it was "Legion;" and that he had this name, because "they were many." A legion is well known to have been a body of Roman soldiers, which at that time consisted of above six thousand men. (Note, Matt. 26:47—56, v. 53.) This therefore gives us a most tremendous view of the subject; though we determine nothing concerning the precise number, which combined under one head in harassing the man. For the question was doubtless asked, and the answer extorted, in order to display the number, power, and malice of those unclean spirits, which Sadducees, ancient and modern, have denied; and which most men are apt unwatchfully to disregard. V. 14—20. The success of the stratagem, formed by these evil spirits, to prejudice the covetous minds of the Gadarenes against Jesus, has been considered: (Note, Matt. 8:33,34.) but we must not overlook the contrary behaviour of the man who was rescued from the demons. (Note, Luke 8:26—39 vv. 31,32,36,39.) He was now found sitting, in proper clothing, composed and rational, at the feet of Jesus, (like Mary, Luke 10:39.) to hear his instructions: and when our Lord entered the ship to go away, according to the sole request of the Gadarenes, he desired leave to accompany him; being full of gratitude to his Benefactor, and desirous of becoming his stated follower; and perhaps fearing the return of the unclean spirits, in case he should be left behind. What a contrast to his own petition while possessed, (7) as well as to that of the Gadarenes! But Jesus had another design in the transaction: and he therefore refused to grant his petition; ordering him to return to his friends, and inform them "what great things the Lord," in his tender compassion, "had done for him." Accordingly he departed, and published in Decapolis, a region in which were ten cities, what great things Jesus had done for him: and as they had been generally acquainted with his former miserable condition, and now saw him perfectly rational, and in good health, they were exceedingly astonished at hearing his thankful account of his deliverance. Thus this very man became the wisest, happiest, and most useful person in the country; and the herald, or preacher, of Christ to his friends and neighbours! being at the same time a living demonstration of his power and mercy; and no doubt he was made the instrument of procuring a more favourable reception to him and his disciples, when they went among them afterwards. (Notes, 7:31—37.)—"What the Lord hath done for thee," (19) as spoken by Jesus, implied what JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, had done for him: but the connexion with the subsequent words, "how great things Jesus had done for him," if it does not evince the man's views, concerning his Benefactor, (which is not improbable,) at least manifests those of the sacred historian; who, had he been afraid of giving his Lord too much honour, would have expressed himself in a more guarded manner. V. 21—24. The two miracles, recorded in the remainder of this chapter, were briefly mentioned by St. Matthew; but the particular consideration of them was reserved for this place. (Note, Matt. 9:18—26.)—Our Lord, having returned to Capernaum, was speedily surrounded by a great multitude of people, who were rejoiced to see him again. (Notes, 2:1,2. Matt. 9:1.)—And not long after, he was addressed by one of the rulers of the synagogue, called Jairus, who seems to have been a person of some distinction in the city. (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Matt. 9:18—26, v. 18.) Being in deep distress, he approached Jesus in the most humble manner, and, casting himself at his feet, besought him to accompany him without delay; as his only daughter, only twelve years old, lay at the point of death, and perhaps might even then be dead: (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, Luke 8:40—56, v. 42.) yet he believed that if Jesus went and laid his hands upon her, she would recover. He seems not to have thought, that Christ could heal her at a distance, or that he could raise her from the dead; though it is probable, this was subsequent to the resurrection of the widow's son at Nain. (Notes, Ps. 78:17—31,41. Matt. 8:8,9. Luke 7:11—17. John 11:20—27, v. 21. 28—32.) Our Lord, however, readily complied with his request, and set off immediately to go to his house.

V. 25—34. While Jesus was walking to the house of Jairus, thronged by the surrounding multitude, he wrought another most remarkable miracle, the account of which here comes in as a parenthesis. A woman, who had been afflicted for twelve years with an issue of blood, which both exceedingly debilitated her frame, and rendered her ceremonially unclean, took that opportunity of applying for a cure. (Lev. 15:25—29.) She had tried other methods of recovery, and had impoverished herself in procuring the aid of physicians; but all in vain; nay, her malady grew still worse; so that (unless by miracle) she had no prospect but that of lingering sufferings, terminating in death. The nature of her disorder made her reluctant to mention it, and she hoped to be cured without doing it. She entertained the highest thoughts of Christ's power and sanctity; but her views of his knowledge, and of the manner in which he wrought his miracles, were confused. She therefore concluded that if she did but touch his clothes, even the border, or fringe of his garment, (Note, Num. 15:38—40.) she should certainly receive a cure; as if this could have been done by any natural efficacy, without his being conscious of it! In pursuance of this design, she seized the opportunity, when Jesus was surrounded by the multitude, and coming behind him touched his garment: nor was she disappointed for notwithstanding the misapprehensions and infirmity mixed with her faith, her disorder was instantaneously removed, and her impaired vigour completely restored; and this not by slow degrees, as it is uniformly the case after the removal, by ordinary means, of such long-continued diseases.—Had the matter terminated here, she would have come short of the instruction, comfort, and advantage, which the Saviour intended her; he would have been deprived of the honour of so extraordinary a miracle; and many thousands would have been left without the encouraging instructions, to be deduced from the transaction. Our Lord therefore, being conscious that "virtue," or divine energy, was gone forth from him to effect this cure, demanded who "had touched his clothes." When all that were near him denied that they had touched him, that is, for any particular purpose, or intention to give offence; (for the woman seems to have retired to a little distance:) Peter and the other apostles expressed their surprise, that he should ask the question: for as numbers thronged him, how could it be expected, but that some must touch him, without meaning to offend. But Jesus still insisted on it, that some person had touched him with a special intention, and had received a cure from his power. And the woman, finding that she could not be concealed, and being alarmed lest he should rebuke her intrusion, came trembling, and fell down before him, and in the presence of all the people declared the whole of her case. As the touch of persons, thus diseased, communicated ceremonial pollution, this perhaps increased her fears. But our Lord, so far from showing any displeasure, addressed her by the affectionate appellation of "daughter;" assured her that her cure was the evidence and happy effect of her faith, by which she had been made whole, or saved; and exhorted her to be of good comfort, and to go away in peace, and to rest assured that she was now finally delivered from that tedious affliction, with which she had so long been chastened. V. 35—43. The preceding transaction occasioned delay, and thus no doubt increased the anxiety of Jairus: but his trial was much greater, when messengers came to inform him that his daughter was dead. (Notes, Prov. 13:12. John 11:1—6,11—16.) When Jesus heard this, he exhorted Jairus not to disquiet himself, "only to believe," namely, that he was able to restore his daughter, and would certainly do it. (Note, 9:16—24.) He then dismissed the multitude, and even all his disciples, except Peter, James, and John; (Note, Matt. 17:1, 2.) that he might be attended by a competent number of witnesses, and yet keep at the utmost distance from all appearance of ostentation, in that display of his power which he was about to make. (9:2. 14:33.) When he arrived at the house, he found that the mourners and minstrels had already been called in, as was customary; and while some played mournful tunes, others uttered the most doleful lamentations. (Marg. Ref. l. Notes, Jer. 9:17,18. Matt. 9:18—26, vv. 23,24.) But Jesus forbad them to weep, and assured them that she was not dead, (so as to continue long in that state,) but was only fallen into a sleep from which she would soon awake. But they, knowing that she was really dead, treated his words with contempt; though they must often have heard of his miracles, and were acquainted with the wisdom and holiness of his character! He therefore put them all out of the room, after he had drawn from them this attestation of her death; and, having none with him, but the parents of the damsel, and his three apostles, he took hold of her hand, and said aloud, as having power over death, and the spirits of the dead, "Talitha, cumi," or "Damsel, arise;" and immediately she arose and walked, to the inexpressible astonishment of the spectators, and doubtless the exceeding joy and gratitude of her before afflicted parents. (Notes, 1 Kings 17:20—24. 2 Kings 4:33—37. Luke 7:11—17. John 11: 41—46. Acts 9:36—43.) Our Lord then commanded them not to mention it to any person. It was sure to be sufficiently known, and in fact the fame of it soon spread abroad very widely. He also directed them to give her something to eat; by which it appeared that she was recovered to full health: and it was thus intimated, that her life must be preserved as before, by ordinary means; being the same as that of others here on earth, and not like that to which the saints shall be restored by the general resurrection.—It is worthy of observation, that of the three persons, whom Christ is particularly recorded to have raised from the dead, one was the only son of a widow, another this only daughter of Jairus, and the third, the beloved brother of Martha and Mary: so much compassion and condescension did he show to the feelings of natural affection. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. This chapter calls us to contemplate the varied glories of our Redeemer's power and love; and each of the instances here set before us, may be considered, not only as a miracle, but also as an emblem of his gracious operations on the souls of men.—If a legion of apostate spirits were combined against one man, who can conceive the numbers, which there are in this wicked world, of which their great leader is "the god" and "prince!" (Notes, John 12:27—33, v. 31. 14: 29—31, v. 30. 2 Cor. 4:3,4. Eph. 2:1—3. 1 John 4:4—6. 5:19. Rev. 12:7—12, v. 9.) The intention and tendency of all their unremitted efforts are to destroy mankind, both in body and soul, and to render them miserable and mischievous. May these alarming thoughts effectually warn every one of us to flee to that refuge, which God has prepared for us in the kingdom of his beloved Son: (Note, Col. 1:9—14, vv. 12—14.)—All unconverted sinners are under a far more fatal possession, than that which distracted men's minds and destroyed their health: (though it is owing to the restraining power of God, that we are preserved even from these dire calamities:) but some wicked men seem to be possessed by a demon, whose name is Legion; their evil propensities and actions are so varied and numerous. Frequently, we see or hear of persons of this kind carried away by their own passions and Satan's temptations, into every scene of pollution and recess of iniquity; so that they dwell among those "whose feet go down to death, whose steps take hold on hell." Neither fear shame, conscience, nor regard to interest or health, can restrain them: neither the affection and authority of parents, the counsel of friends, the requirements and sanctions of human laws, the feelings of present painful effects of their vices, nor the dread of "the wrath to come," can deter them from their destructive courses. In whatever way they be bound and fettered, their strong corruptions and evil habits break loose from every restriction, and "no man can tame them. (Note, Rom. 8:3,4.) Thus they reduce themselves to penury disease, a prison, or an ignominious death; in the mean time, they are the reproach and grief of their friends, the terror and nuisance of the neighbourhood, and a mortified and pernicious part of the community. Yet, if Jesus be pleased to exert his power, he can bring the most abandoned and hardened of them to tremble and fall down before him; and thus effect a blessed change in his character and conduct. But the poor sinner, when this work is first begun, often fears that the gracious Saviour means to torment or destroy him; and is ready to cry out, "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God?" This arises not only from unbelief and error, but also from the artifice of these malignant enemies, who are reluctant to leave those over whom they have hitherto reigned without a rival. They dare not however resist the power of Christ, who can, if he pleases, consign them to the place of torment: and, knowing this, they on some occasions even become his suppliants, and earnestly beseech and adjure him to respite their punishment, or continue their allowance to tempt and distress the sinful race of men.—But all the hosts of hell, formidable as they are, cannot destroy one frantic sinner, or so much as possess one swine, except the Redeemer grants them permission. This is a most encouraging thought to the believer: but what comfort can Satan's willing servants derive from it? (Note, Job 1:9—12.) Yet even in respect of them, his power is limited: for the same agency, which hurried the swine into the sea, would have been sufficient for the immediate destruction of their avaricious possessors, had not the power of Christ restrained it. Long-suffering and mercy may therefore be recognised in those corrections, by which men are deprived of property; whilst their lives are preserved, and warning is given them to seek the salvation of their souls.

V. 14—20. Losses and alarms frequently terrify and exasperate sinners, instead of promoting repentance: and those who are determined not to part with iniquitous gain, or to mortify their corrupt passions, are as averse to the gospel of Christ, as unclean spirits themselves are.—But when the most enslaved sinner is delivered by the power of Jesus from the possession of Satan and the bondage of sin, he will gladly sit at the feet, and hear the word, of his great Deliverer. Being "come to himself," and to "his right mind," he now learns to love and cleave to Christ, and longs to be with him and like him. (Notes, Phil. 1:21—26. 1 John 3:1—3.) When these desires grow very vigorous, and are accompanied with an assured hope of heavenly felicity, he is willing "to be absent from the body that he may be present with the Lord:" no wonder therefore, that he chooses rather to part with father and mother, or the nearest relations and most valued possessions, than to forsake Christ, and lose the benefit and comfort of his instruction, and of communion with him. Words cannot express the blessed change which takes place, when Jesus delivers such wretched slaves of Satan, as have been before described, and numbers them among his saints and servants. Instead of their former abject misery, they now enjoy a felicity before unknown; they henceforth become the ornament and blessing of their families; they are made partakers of a heavenly wisdom, and a glorious liberty; and they are rendered useful in those communities, to which before they were a terror, or a temptation. They go among their friends and neighbours, to bear testimony to Christ; "showing what great things he hath done for them, and hath had compassion on them;" and, whilst their conduct evinces the reality and excellency of the change, they often excite great attention, and are made the instruments of inducing even their more orderly neighbours to hearken to the gospel, which before they neglected. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:17—21. Gal. 1:15—24. 1 Thes. 1:5—8. 1 Tim. 1:12—16. 2 Pet. 1:13—15.) Nay, the Lord sometimes makes choice of such converts for his ministers: and, whilst they publish through cities and countries, what great things Jesus has done for them; their simple testimony confirmed by their characters, renders them extensive blessings, and sometimes in those places where they were once most mischievous. Indeed, we all seem to be continued in this world of sin and sorrow, after our conversion, chiefly to declare and display, by word and deed, the Saviour's power and grace among our fellow sinners.

V. 21—34. Our blessed Lord will not obtrude himself on those who are not disposed to entertain him; nor refuse his presence and salvation to any whose hearts are prepared to welcome him.—The feeling of distress, for which men can obtain no adequate remedy, from themselves or others, is frequently the means of bringing them to Christ: and thus severe family trials are sometimes appointed in love, to show those in affluence especially the vanity of their distinctions; and so lead them to inquire after a better portion, and a spiritual salvation.—Those who are in temporal distress, readily find words to express their meaning and desires: how is it then, that men experience such difficulty in presenting their supplications before God? Certainly, because they have not so distinct an understanding of their wants, nor so deep a feeling of their dangers and miseries.—There are different degrees and exercises of faith, where it is vital and saving; but that which most honours Christ, will be most advantageous to us. The history of his life is an account of his continued earnestness in doing good, without weariness or intermission; so that we know not whether we should most admire his divine power, or his beneficent use of it: and, whilst we derive encouragement from this reflection, let us learn to use our little ability in doing what we can, to alleviate the miseries and promote the benefit of mankind.—And if we look around and make diligent inquiry, we shall find many pious Christians, wasted by disease, pinched by penury, and lodged in cottages, cellars, garrets, or almshouses; whilst stately palaces are often scenes of riot to infidels, profligates, and cruel oppressors. But "the prosperity of fools destroys them," and the afflictions of the righteous conduce to their everlasting felicity.—Men often prove vain helpers, even in temporal calamities, and only add to our sufferings by their efforts to relieve us: yet the aversion of sinners to seek help from God, in this respect, is very conspicuous; for they will try every method of redress, and persevere, after reiterated disappointments, in running to this and the other fellow-creature; yet they will not apply to him, who alone can render means and instruments successful, and who can help us when all other helpers fail! Thus many, through their own obstinacy, or for want of wholesome instruction, waste their time and strength to no purpose, by applying to "physicians of no value;" from whom they "suffer many things," and get no better, but "rather grow worse." Some run into diversions, and gay company, to pacify an uneasy conscience, or to relieve the dejection of their spirits; many plunge into a hurry of business, into abstruse speculations, or even into intemperance, for the same purpose; and others "go about to establish their own righteousness," or torment themselves by vain superstitions: thus numbers perish miserably. But happy are they who, by many disappointments, are led to hearken to the report of the gospel, and to expect help from Jesus alone: for even their remaining infirmity and misapprehensions will not prevent their obtaining the desired blessing. (Note, Matt. 11:28—30.)—The example before us may likewise instruct us to receive and encourage those, who seem humbly to rely on Christ for pardon and grace; though in many respects mistaken and defective.—In proportion as our faith in Christ brings peace into our conscience, and destroys the love and power of sin, it is proved to be genuine: and the more singly we depend on him, and expect great things from him; the more evidently we shall find that he is become our salvation. Thus he gradually and effectually teaches his people, by their own experience: he evinces to them his knowledge of their thoughts, their wants, and their difficulties; and he shows his power and love in relieving and helping them. But, whilst we have the benefit he will secure to himself the glory, of all that he does for us and he will at length bring to light, in numberless instances, the "virtue that hath gone forth from him," to heal those hidden evils of the heart, under which his people had groaned for years before they sought to him. Yet, while multitudes throng around him, as it were, by crowding the places where the gospel is preached; only here and there one thus "touches him," in humble faith, as the lives of most too plainly testify.—Even the disciples of Christ are, in many instances, apt to express themselves dissatisfied with his words and works, with the dispensations of his providence and grace. This is the effect of remaining pride, ignorance, and unbelief: for no believer, to this hour, ever could conceive of his compassion and love half so highly as they deserve; though he sometimes conceals them under a frown or a rebuke. Humble souls, therefore, in seeking to him, are apt to tremble and fear, lest he should abhor or destroy them; whilst his heart yearns with pity, and he is about to say to them, as to his children, "Be of good comfort, go in peace, thy faith hath saved thee." For he will honour that faith, which honours him, by seeking from him all the blessings which he is exalted to bestow.

V. 35—43. The Lord will not let any one, who waits on him, be a loser by his kindness to others: his delays are intended to render his favours more precious: he waits for our extremities, that he may manifest his glory, and encourage our faith and hope. He regards no application to him as a trouble, and no case can be desperate which he undertakes: we should not therefore yield to fear, but desire and pray to be strengthened in faith, in the most difficult circumstances; and he will then fulfil his word, and all our expectations grounded on it. (Notes, Rom. 4:18—25.)—No wonder that worldly men make a tumult, with wailing and lamentation, when bereaved of those whom they love; for they have no prospect, or a very gloomy one, beyond the grave: but Christians should not "sorrow as men without hope, for them who sleep in the Lord;" nor should they indulge grief, or affect to be inconsolable, for any loss; as the Lord still lives to be their never-failing Friend and Comforter. Indeed death is but a sleep to believers; and we shall soon join our deceased Christian friends in that world, where sin and all its effects will be known no more. (Notes, Prov. 14:32. 1 Thes. 4:13—18.) But our gracious Redeemer, while he rebukes our excessive sorrow, makes kind allowances to the feelings of nature and affection: and, though we cannot now expect to have our deceased children or relatives restored to us; yet, we may hope to experience consolations proportioned to our trials.—When sinners ridicule the truths and promises of Christ; they exclude themselves from witnessing or experiencing their gracious accomplishment: for he has the power over death, the grave, and the unseen world; and he will ere long bring forth all the nations of the dead to appear before his awful tribunal, and to hear his powerful word, either calling them to inherit eternal felicity, or bidding them depart into everlasting punishment. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. John 5:28,29. Rev. 20:11—15.) May he then raise our 'souls from the death of sin to the life of righteousness;' that we may now feed on his spiritual provisions, and walk with him in his holy ways, as the trophies and monuments of his grace; and that when he shall at length "appear, we may also appear with him in glory." (Note, Col. 3:1—4.)

NOTES.—CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 13:54—58. Luke 4:16—32.) In this account of our Lord's last visit to Nazareth, (as it appears to have been,) we find that the people asked "Is not this the carpenter?" whence it has reasonably been concluded, that he had wrought with Joseph at this laborious business, during the former years of his life.—Justin Martyr says, that 'being among men he made ploughs and yokes, which are the works of carpenters.'—By the Jewish canons, all fathers were bound to teach their children some trade: Jesus was not educated in the schools of human learning; but having "for our sakes become poor," he, "the second Adam," submitted to the sentence denounced on the "first Adam," and ate his "bread in the sweat of his brow." (Notes, Gen. 3:17—19. Acts 18:1—6.)

5 And [l]he could there do no mighty works, save that he [m]laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them.

6 And he [n]marvelled because of their unbelief. And he went round about the villages teaching.

7 ¶ And he calleth unto him [o]the twelve, and began to send them forth by [p]two and two; and gave them [q]power over unclean spirits;

8 And commanded them that they should [r]take nothing for their journey, save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no [s]money in their purse:

9 But be shod with [t]sandals; and not put on two coats.

10 And he said unto them, [u]In what place soever ye enter into an house, there abide till ye depart from that place.

11 And [v]whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear you, when ye depart thence, shake off the dust under your feet for a testimony against them. Verily I say unto you, [x]It shall be more tolerable for Sodom [y]and Gomorrah, [z]in the day of judgment, than for that city.

12 And they went out, and [z]preached that men should repent.

13 And they [a]cast out many devils, and [b]anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ And [c]king Herod heard of him; (for [d]his name was spread abroad:) and he said, That John the Baptist was risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him.

15 Others said, That [e]it is Elias. And others said, That it is [f]a prophet, or as one of the prophets.

16 But when Herod heard thereof, he said, [g]It is John, whom I beheaded: he is risen from the dead.

17 For [h]Herod himself had sent forth and laid hold upon John, and bound him in prison for Herodias's sake, his brother [i]Philip's wife; [A. D. 30.] for he had married her.

18 For John had said unto Herod, [k]It is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's wife.

19 Therefore [l]Herodias had [z]a quarrel against him, and would have killed him; but she could not.

20 For Herod [m]feared John, knowing that he was a just man, and an holy, and [s]observed him; and when he heard him, he did many things, [u]and heard him gladly.

21 And [o]when a convenient day was come, that Herod on [p]his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee;

22 And when [q]the daughter of the said Herodias came in, and danced and pleased Herod, and them that sat with him; the king said unto the damsel, Ask of me whatsoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee.

23 And [r]he sware unto her, [s]Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom.

24 And she went forth, and [t]said unto her mother, What shall I ask? And she said, [u]The head of John the Baptist.

25 And she came in straightway [x]with haste unto the king, and asked, saying, I will that thou give me by and by, in [y]a charger, the head of John the Baptist.

26 And the king [z]was exceeding sorry; yet for his oath's sake, and for their sakes which sat with him, he would not reject her.

27 And immediately [a]the king sent [‖]an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought: and he went and beheaded him in the prison, 28 And brought his head in a charger, and gave it to the damsel: and the damsel gave it to her mother.

V. 5, 6. Jesus "could not" with propriety work many miracles at Nazareth, or the people did not give him the opportunity, by bringing their sick to be healed. It seems, however, that there were some exceptions; and therefore he wrought a few miraculous cures. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, 1:45.) The obstinate and unreasonable unbelief and contempt of the Nazarenes were truly wonderful, when all their advantages are considered: and our Lord is generally spoken of as affected with the scenes around him, according to the nature of them, in the same manner as we should have been; except as sinful emotions are also excited in us, from which he was perfectly free. (Marg. Ref. m.)

V. 13. Learned men have bestowed some pains to show, that it was usual with the Jews to anoint the sick with oil, in order to their recovery; and some think that the apostles complied with this custom, without any direction from their Lord. But this is not at all probable; nor can we suppose that the miraculous effect would have followed, had they acted without orders. Doubtless, in this they observed the directions given them by Christ: and the observance was intended to be an outward sign of his inward operation; which was itself an emblem of healing our souls by the unction of the Holy Spirit. This practice was continued for some time in the church, as the token of a miraculous cure: but it was obvious, that it must be left off, when miracles ceased. Yet the popish ceremony (or sacrament, as they call it) of 'extreme unction,' seems absurdly to have been derived from it; for that is not used in order to a miraculous cure, but when all hope of recovery is given up. V. 14—29. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 14:3—12. Luke 3:19,20. 9:7—9.—King Herod. (14) Thus his courtiers and flatterers called him, though only a tetrarch, or governor of Galilee under the Romans; being a fourth part of his father's kingdom. (Notes, Matt. 14:1,2. Luke 3:1.)—"It is not easy to meet with a more striking instance than this of the force of conscience over a guilty mind, or a stronger proof how perpetually it goads the sinner, not only with well-grounded ... apprehensions of impending ... vengeance, but with imaginary terrors and visionary dangers. ... There is reason to believe that Herod ... was of the sect called the Sadducees: ... yet his fears overruled all the prejudices of his sect, and raised up the semblance of the murdered Baptist, armed with the power of miracles, for the very purpose (as he imagined) of inflicting exemplary vengeance upon him for that atrocious deed; as well as for his adultery, his incest, and all his other crimes. ... Herod had been married a considerable time to the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petræa; but conceiving a violent passion for his brother Philip's wife, Herodias, he first seduced her affections from her husband, then dismissed his own wife, and married Herodias during the lifetime of his brother.—The Baptist had the honesty and the courage to reproach the tyrant with the enormity of his guilt: ... he determined to do his duty, and to take the consequences. ... Herod observed John, that is, listened to him with attention and with pleasure: nay, he went further still, "he did many things," ... which John exhorted ... him to do. ... He perhaps showed more attention to many of his public duties, more gentleness to his subjects, more compassion to the poor, more equity in his judicial determinations, more regard to public worship; and vainly hoped, like many other audacious sinners, that this partial reformation, this half-way amendment, would avert the judgments with which John threatened him. But the main point, the great object of John's reprehension, the incestuous adultery in which he lived, that he could not part with. ... What a picture does this hold out to us, of that strange thing called human nature. Of that inconsistence, that contradiction, that contrariety, which sometimes takes place in the heart of man, unsanctified and unsubdued by the power of divine grace! And what an exalted idea does it give of the dignity of a truly religious 30 ¶ And [c]the apostles gathered themselves together unto Jesus, and told him all things, [d]both what they had done, and what they had taught.

31 And he said unto them, [e]Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile: for there were many coming and going, and they had no leisure so much as to eat.

32 And they departed into a desert place by ship privately.

33 And the people saw them departing, and many [f]knew him, and ran a-foot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto him.

34 And Jesus, when he came out, [g]saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, [h]because they were as sheep not having a shepherd: [i]and he began to teach them many things.

35 ¶ And [k]when the day was now far spent, his disciples came unto him, and said, This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed;

36 [l]Send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat.

37 He answered and said unto them, [m]Give ye them to eat. And they say unto him, [n]Shall we go and buy two hundred [o]pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?

38 He saith unto them, How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, [p]Five, and two fishes.

39 And he commanded them to make [q]all sit down by companies upon the green grass.

40 And they sat down in ranks, [r]by hundreds, and by fifties.

41 And when he had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, [s]he looked up to heaven, and [t]blessed, and brake the loaves, and gave them to his disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided he among them all.

42 And they did all eat, [u]and were filled.

43 And they took up [v]twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes.

44 And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men.

45 And [x]straightway he constrained his disciples to get into the ship, and to go to the other side before [y]unto [z]Bethsaida, while he sent away the people.

46 And when he had sent them away, [a]he departed into a mountain to pray.

47 ¶ And when even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and he alone on the land.

48 And [a]he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary unto them: and about [b]the fourth watch of the night [c]he cometh unto them, walking upon the sea, and [d]would have passed by them.

49 But when they saw him walking upon the sea, they [e]supposed it had been a spirit, and cried out;

50 For they all saw him, and were troubled: and immediately he talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer: [f]It is I; be not afraid.

51 And he went up unto them into the ship; [g]and the wind ceased; [h]and they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered.

character, like that of John, which compels even its bitterest enemies to reverence and to fear it! and forces even the most profligate, and most powerful, to pay an unwilling homage to excellence, at the very moment, perhaps, when they are meditating its destruction! ... The fate of John might have remained undecided for a considerable time, had not an incident taken place, which determined it. ... The folly, the rashness, and the madness of such an oath,' (as Herod's) 'on so foolish an occasion, could be exceeded by nothing but the horrible purpose to which it was perverted. ... Herodias had a passion to gratify, stronger perhaps than any other, when it takes full possession of the human heart, and that was revenge. She had been mortally injured, as she conceived, by the Baptist: ... and she not only felt the highest indignation at this insult, but was afraid that his repeated remonstrances might at length prevail. ... Herod, conceiving himself, most absurdly, bound by his oath to comply even with this inhuman demand, ... preferred the real guilt of murder, to the false imputation of perjury. Herodias "had a quarrel against John:" according to the original, "she fastened and hung upon him," and was determined not to let go her hold, till she had destroyed him. ... We are informed by Josephus, that Herod's marriage with Herodias drew on him the resentment of Aretas, ... the father of his first wife, who declared war against him, and ... defeated his army with great slaughter. This, says the historian, the Jews considered as the just judgment of God for his murder of John. ... Not long after this, both he and Herodias were deprived of their kingdom by the Roman emperor, and sent into perpetual banishment: and it is added by another historian, that ... Salome met with a violent and untimely death.' Bp. Porteus.

The latter word is taken from beds in a garden, to which companies of people, seated in rows, twice the number in rank as in file, would bear some resemblance. Many expositors seem to think, that the whole multitude formed one body, a hundred in rank and fifty in file: but the plural number '(companies, companies; ranks, ranks,') leads us to conclude, that several distinct companies were formed, but all arranged in the same manner.—Bethsaida. (45) Bethsaida was near the place where Jesus and the disciples then were, and probably to the east of the sea of Tiberias: but learned men are not agreed in respect of its situation. V. 47—52. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 14:22—32.) Had the disciples duly reflected on the miracle which Christ had wrought, in feeding the multitude, they would not have been so exceedingly amazed at his walking on the waves of the sea, and causing the tempest to subside. But their minds were in part hardened, through remaining unbelief and carnal prejudices; so that they did not make a proper improvement of the miracles which they beheld, nor durably retain the impressions, which at first were made on them. Thus they speedily forgot their conviction of the divine power of their Lord; and this occasioned their astonishment at every renewed display of it. (Note, 6:17—21.) The same words are sometimes used for the remaining, and in a degree prevailing evil in true disciples, as for the total dominion of evil in unbelievers. (Matt. 16:23. Rom. 8:5,6. 1 Co. 3:1.) This is not duly attended to by some controversial writers.—[1]Some cheats have pretended to cure diseases miraculously; and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. We are taught, by our Lord's example, to renew our endeavours for the spiritual good even of those who have already treated us with cruelty or contempt, and where danger and contumely may again be expected: and we are reminded that industry, in the meanest and most laborious honest calling, is far more honourable and beneficial than indolence or dissipation, especially in youth. They therefore, who are placed in inferior situations, should cheerfully go on with their employments; and, if God have work of another kind for them, this will prove no hinderance to their future usefulness. Worldly men indeed despise the most wise and excellent persons, because of their mean extraction, low occupations, or poor relations; or on account of their own previous familiarity with them, or superiority over them: for unbelief will always find some objection against the truth, and those who are zealous for it: but while their unreasonable prejudices preclude them from the benefit, the servants of God will find others disposed to profit by them.—Indeed the inhabitants of villages are often more ready to welcome the gospel, than those of flourishing and populous cities: if therefore we fail of meeting with acceptance in the latter, we should be satisfied to go and teach poor peasants and cottagers the way of salvation. (Note, Jer. 5:3—6.)—The Lord Jesus, the Fountain of all authority in his church, dispenses to every man as he pleases: and he will surely qualify and assist those, whom he commissions to preach his gospel.—Where the truth has hitherto been but little known, it is very desirable that ministers should go forth at least by two and two; that they may have the comfort and benefit of each other's society, counsel, and prayers. (Note, Ec. 4:9—12.)—While faithful preachers earnestly desire and uprightly design to be a blessing to the people; and, content with food and raiment, however mean and scanty, seek "not theirs but them;" they often prove the occasion of deeper condemnation to those, who constrain them to "shake off the dust of their feet for a testimony against them," by refusing to hear and receive their message.—How heinous a sin must unbelief be, in all who have the adequate means of conviction; seeing a righteous God will render the final doom of those who refuse the salvation of the gospel, even more intolerable than that of Sodom and Gomorrah! (Notes, John 3:19—21. Heb. 2:1—4. 12:22—25.)—The servants of Christ must go forth in his name, every where "preaching, that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance;" and enforcing their exhortations both by the terrors of the law, and by the encouraging truths and promises of the gospel. In this way we may hope that our labours will be blessed, to turn many "from darkness unto light, and the power of Satan unto God," and that we shall be the instruments of healing their souls by the unction of the Holy Spirit.

V. 14—29. When the truths, and honour of Christ are spread abroad, by the successful labours of his ministers: men will make their observations or conjectures respecting them, according to their different humours or prejudices: and then the secret remorse and horror of conscience, which wicked men experience, will often be brought to light. (Note, Ps. 73:18—22.)—No infidel principles, or hardness of heart, or worldly grandeur, can at all times preserve the enemies of God from terrors and anxieties. They are seldom wholly exempt from convictions of their own guilt, and they are often unable to exclude the dread of divine vengeance. They may imprison or murder their reprovers, but this only increases the clamour of their inward monitor and accuser: and any person, who understands and believes the Bible, may predict the consequence of a man's determining to mount, if possible, the summit of prosperity, by whatever means and at any rate: for if he succeed, he will find his desired eminence a most turbulent, anxious, and perilous situation: and unless he have the wisdom and grace to descend speedily into the valley of humiliation, he will soon be cast down into the depths of hell.—We may see the reason, why men cannot receive the message of God's ministers, and why they treat them with contempt and enmity: they feel that their example and doctrin is a reproach; their pride is affronted, their consciences are disquieted, and their darling indulgences opposed: and thus they, excited by their associates in iniquity, have an irreconcilable quarrel against the very persons whom they cannot but stand in awe of, as "just and holy men," whom they have often heard with apparent satisfaction, and at whose instance they have "done many things."[*] But the frame of men's minds is very different, when they are hearing the word of God, as delivered by a heart-searching awakening preacher than it is at those times, when they are celebrating luxurious and joyous feasts, indulging their appetites, surrounded with flatterers, and carousing with dissipated companions. (Note, Dan. 5:1—4.) Such revels are Satan's opportunities: he waits for them, in order to take his advantage, to push men forward into those enormities, from which they were restrained by remaining scruples, in their more sober hours. Hence it has often been known, that the most atrocious murders have been hastily committed, as it were, to grace a riotous banquet, or to gratify some worthless individual, who had contributed to the luxury or conviviality of the occasion! (Note, 2 Sam. 13:22—29.) Thus the great murderer of men carries his point, and employs his servants in the infatuated work of destroying each other's lives and souls.—If the history of persecutions and martyrs could be written, under the guidance of inspiration: it would be found, that thousands of the most valuable lives had fallen a sacrifice to the revenge of some ambitious and licentious Herodias; or of some base wretch, whose pride had been affronted, and whose success in wickedness had been impeded or endangered by their faithful reproofs. Yet even those who are instigated by such prompters often avow, that their conscience and honour are concerned; and devise to connect oaths, engagements, and regard to friends, to the public peace, or the good of the church, with the gratification of their iniquitous cruelty and revenge! They can, however, do the faithful servants of God no real harm: he will graciously vouchsafe them another kind of recompense than they receive from men; and avenge their cause on those who repay their friendly warnings with indignity and cruelty. But what will be the doom of those, who have instigated even their own children, and nearest relatives, to the most atrocious crimes, in order to gratify their own malignant and hateful passions! (P. O. Matt. 14:1—12.)

V. 30—56. While the enemies of God are triumphing in their short-lived success, and his friends are mourning over the loss of those who have entered into their rest; he will send forth other ministers to spread his gospel, and will protect them in their labours till they be finished. Every minister must give an account of himself to Christ at last: and it behooves us now to do it continually before his "throne of grace;" both concerning "all we have done, and all we have aught." Thus we shall have the comfort of his gracious acceptance of that which has been right, and obtain his blessing upon our labours: and thus we may seek his merciful forgiveness of what has been wrong, pray that the effects of it may be counteracted, and learn to profit even by our own mistakes and offences.—Our blessed Lord, knowing our frailty, will allow and provide for us seasons of relaxation after fatiguing exertions in his service: that we may be recruited for our work, recollect ourselves respecting the state of our own souls, and receive further instructions from him concerning our future conduct: and if he, by sickness, or any other providential hinderance, lay us aside for a season from our work; we should not think the time wasted, but listen more attentively to his teaching, and seek to profit by the visitation.—Those who know the preciousness of Christ and his salvation, and have learned where he may be found, will break through all hinderances, that they may seek to him: nor will he refuse instruction or assistance to those, who deviate from ordinary rules, in their earnestness to obtain the blessings of salvation. He has tender compassion for them who are "as sheep not having a shepherd;" and such as wait on him, take the best method of obtaining all things needful for soul and body: for, as he died on the cross, that he might feed our perishing souls with "the bread of life," he will not fail, in his providence, to give us food for our bodies also. While we therefore cheerfully and thankfully depend on his power and grace, let us copy his example, in being accessible at all times to those who want our help; in compassionating the temporal afflictions of our neighbours, as well as the lost condition of their souls; and in being always "ready to distribute, and glad to communicate" to their necessities. In order to this, we should be frugal in our own expenses, that we may have the more to employ in liberality; and we may trust in the Lord to make up, by his blessing, whatever is necessary to our state in life

CHAPTER VII.

The Pharisees find fault with the disciples for eating with unwashen hands; and Jesus shows that their traditions "make void the law of God," 1—13. He teaches the source and nature of defilement, 14—23. heals the daughter of a Syrophenician woman, 24—30; and a man who was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, 31—37.

THEN came together unto him [a]the Pharisees, and certain of the scribes, which came from Jerusalem.

2 And when they saw some of his disciples eat bread with [*]defiled, that is to say, with unwashen hands, [b]they found fault.

3 For the Pharisees, and all the Jews, except they wash their hands [†]oft, eat not, holding [c]the tradition of the elders.

4 And when they come from the market, [d]except they wash, they eat not. And many other things there be which they have received to hold, as the washing of cups, and [‡]pots, brazen vessels, and of [§]tables.

5 Then the Pharisees and scribes asked him, Why [e]walk not thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashen hands?

6 He answered and said unto them, [f]Well hath Esaias prophesied of you [g]hypocrites, as it is written, This people [h]honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me.

7 Howbeit [i]in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines [k]the commandments of men.

8 For, laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold [l]the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups: and many other such like things ye do.

9 And he said unto them, [m]Full well ye [‖]reject the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition.

10 For Moses said, [n]Honour thy father and thy mother; and, [o]Whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death.

11 But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, [p]It is Corban, that is to say, A gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; he shall be free.

12 And ye suffer him no more to do aught for his father or his mother;

We should also learn to connect piety and charity together; and to delight alternately in communion with God, and in doing good to men: and should we meet with storms and difficulties in the path of duty, we may by faith behold our heavenly Advocate pleading our cause, and ready to come to our help, as it were "walking upon the waves," silencing the tempest as he pleases: and allaying our terrors by saying, "Be of good cheer: It is I: be not afraid."—Did we duly regard even our own experience of his power, truth, and love, we should not be so much alarmed at renewed difficulties, or at formidable appearances: our expectations would then be raised higher; and, though our amazement at his renewed interpositions might be less, our admiring gratitude and praise would be greater, than they now are. But we lose much of our comfort, in the watchful care of our Lord, by remaining unbelief, forgetfulness, and hardness of heart.—Did men value the health of their souls as they do that of their bodies, and had they strong faith in the Redeemer's power and grace, they would flock to him from villages and cities, sparing neither trouble nor inconvenience, and beseeching him, that they might be enabled in faith to "touch even the hem of his garment;" for certainly those who thus apply to him, will be made whole of their most inveterate diseases.—And here again let us learn to be doing good wherever we go, and to seek the salvation of Christ, for others as well as for ourselves.

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1. 'None do more resist the wisdom of God, than they that should be wisest; and that upon zeal for their own traditions; for men do not please themselves more in any thing than in superstition; ... to which hypocrisy is a constant companion.' Beza. It should have been 'a general companion.'—It is probable, the chosen persons of the Pharisees and scribes had been deputed to watch the conduct and discourses of Jesus, in order to find matter of accusation against him; and had come from Jerusalem for this purpose, though they did not avow it. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 15:1,2.)

V. 3, 4. (Note, Matt. 15:1,2.) This evangelist gives a more particular account of these traditional washings, than Matthew did.—The Pharisees and other Jews used not to eat, except "they washed their hands oft," or diligently, being afraid of having inadvertently contracted defilement. When they returned from the markets or places of public resort, they would not eat, except they washed, or were baptized; and "they had received," and very tenaciously held, many such things as "the washing," or baptisms "of cups, pots," and even of their "tables," or rather beds, the couches on which they reclined to meat. If we suppose that they always bathed the whole body, after they returned from the markets, which is not very probable; we cannot conceive that they plunged their couches in water also. The Pharisees blamed Christ's disciples for "eating with unwashen hands;" and not for not immersing their bodies in water: so it seems undeniable, that by the words baptize and baptisms, a partial application of water was intended, in this, as well as in several other places. (Notes, Luke 11:37,38. Heb. 9:8—10.)—'A man shall wash his hands in the morning, so that it shall suffice him for the whole day; and he shall not need to wash his hands as oft as he eats; which holds if he do not avert his mind any other way; (that is, go abroad, or meddle with business, or go to the market, &c.) but if he do so, he is bound to wash his hands as oft as there is need of washing.' Maimonides in Hammond. This washing is here called being baptized; not the hands being baptized, but the persons being baptized.—It is intimated here, that these observances were not peculiar to the Pharisees, but general among the Jews, through the influence of the scribes and elders: and this shows that the conduct of our Lord and his disciples, in this protest, was very marked and pointed. The rites of the ceremonial law they strictly observed; and paid the required tribute, lest they should give offence: (Notes, Matt. 17:24—27. 23:1—4.) but as the traditions of the elders undermined the authority of the divine law, our Lord himself openly refused to comply with them, and taught his disciples to do the same. V. 11,12. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 15:3—6.) Corban is a Hebrew word, very frequently used in the Old Testament, for different kinds of sacred oblations.—Some have supposed that this might be especially meant of a rash vow made by a man in a passion, that he would do nothing more for his parents, but would rather give all that he could spare to the treasury of the temple; which would be equivalent to cursing them: yet the blind Pharisees had determined that even such a vow ought to be religiously observed! The words however seem to mean generally, that any man's vow, to devote his substance, or what could be spared, to the Corban, was supposed not only to excuse him from relieving his parents, but to subject him to a dreadful curse, if he did; to avoid which, he would rather venture on the consequence of breaking the commandment of God. This makes the contrast very striking.

28 And she answered and said unto him, Yes, Lord, [r]yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs.

29 And he said unto her, [s]For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter.

30 And when [t]she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed.

31 ¶ And again, departing [u]from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of [x]Decapolis.

32 And they [y]bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech him to put his hand upon him.

33 And [z]he took him aside from the multitude, and put his fingers into his ears, and he spit, and touched his tongue;

34 And [a]looking up to heaven, [b]he sighed, and saith unto him, [c]Ephphatha, that is, [d]Be opened.

35 And [e]straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain.

36 And [f]he charged them that they should tell no man: but the more he charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it.

Yet, having heard concerning the miracles and doctrine of Jesus, (3:8. Matt. 4:24.) and doubtless having compared what she heard with the prophecies of the Messiah, she assuredly knew that he was the Messiah; and without hesitation addressed him in that character!—She was not only a true, but a most eminent believer.—What an inducement to disperse the Bible!

V. 31—36. This miracle is nowhere else recorded. The dispossessed demoniac had declared, through the region of Decapolis, "what great things Jesus had done for him." (5:20.) Some persons indeed, long before, attended on Christ from that country: (Matt. 4:25.) but it is probable, that the man's testimony had considerable effect in disposing the people to regard Jesus with greater reverence and expectation, when he went again into those parts. (Note, 5:14—20.) They immediately therefore brought unto him a man, who was deaf, and could scarcely speak, entreating him to cure him by laying his hand upon him, as he frequently did: (5:23. Note, 2 Kings 5:9—12, v. 11.) but he was pleased on this occasion to vary his method, and to show that he was not confined to any one. (Note, 8:22—26.) He took the man aside, put his fingers in his ears, and, spitting, touched his tongue. Then "looking up to heaven," to denote that he acted by a divine power, in perfect union with the Father, and "sighing," as sympathizing with the man in misery, and in a view of the calamities to which men are exposed by sin; (Notes, John 11:33—46, vv. 33,35,38,41.) he said with authority, "Be opened;" and an immediate cure ensued, to the exceedingly great astonishment of the people, who acknowledged the power, goodness, and excellency of his works, in this and other instances. And, though he charged them, as usual, not to publish the miracle, this only proved an occasion to them the more to speak of it. They probably deemed it improper, that his wonderful works should be concealed, through his care in avoiding ostentation. (Notes, Matt. 9:30,31.)

CHAPTER VIII.

Jesus miraculously feeds the multitudes, 1—9; refuses the Pharisees a sign, 10—13; warns the disciples against their leaven, and that of Herod; and reproves them for dulness of understanding, 14—21; gives sight to a blind man at Bethsaida, 22—26; approves Peter's confession, predicts his own sufferings, and rebukes Peter for objecting to them, 27—33; and teaches self-denial and a willingness to suffer for his sake, 34—50.

IN those days, [a]the multitude being very great, and having nothing to eat, Jesus called his disciples unto him, and saith unto them,

2 I have [b]compassion on the multitude, because they have now been with me three days, [c]and have nothing to eat:

3 And if I send them away fasting to their own houses, [d]they will faint by the way; for divers of them came from far.

4 And his disciples answered him, [e]From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?

5 And he asked them, [f]How many loaves have ye? And they said, Seven.

6 And he commanded the people [g]to sit down on the ground: and he took the seven loaves, [h]and gave thanks, and brake, and gave to his disciples to set before them; and they did set them before the people.

7 And they had a few small [i]fishes: and he blessed, and commanded to set them also before them.

8 So they did eat, [k]and were filled: and they took up of the broken meat that was left seven baskets.

9 And they that had eaten were about four thousand: and he sent them away.

10 ¶ And [l]straightway he entered into a ship with his disciples, and came into the parts of Dalmanutha.

11 And the [m]Pharisees came forth and began to question with him, [n]seeking of him a sign from heaven, [o]tempting him.

12 And [p]he sighed deeply in his spirit, and saith, [q]Why doth this generation seek after a sign? Verily I say unto you, [r]There shall no sign be given unto this generation.

13 And [s]he left them, and entering into the ship again departed to the other side.

14 ¶ Now the disciples [t]had forgotten to take bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf.

15 And [u]he charged them, saying, [x]Take heed,

V. 37. (Note, 9.) This unreserved commendation implied that Jesus was the predicted Messiah, and that the Pharisees and scribes were highly criminal in opposing him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. Those "clean hands and that pure heart," which Christ requires and bestows, are very different from the external decency, and superstitious forms and appearances of sanctity, which have distinguished Pharisees in every age. (Notes, Matt. 5:8. 2 Cor. 7:1. Jam. 4:7—10.) Their outward purifications and ceremonies can neither purge the conscience from guilt, nor the affections from avarice, ambition, sensuality, or hypocrisy: and if our hearts be purified by faith and grace, we need no human inventions in accession, but "all things will be made clean unto us." Yet formalists commonly find fault with true disciples, for not complying with their superstitions; and plead his authority for them, in order to bear down his cause and persecute his people!—Men may be very zealous for various plausible and burdensome observances, and exact in attending to them: yet remain strangers to true religion, enemies of Christ, and hypocritical worshippers. This must be the case of those zealots, of every denomination, who "reject the commandments of God," and the doctrines of the gospel, "that they may keep their own traditions:" and all vows or engagements must be antichristian and impious, which allow children to dishonour or neglect their parents; or which authorize men to violate the important and immutable obligations of justice, mercy, and truth. A spiritual understanding of the holy law of God, and of the evil of sin; an acquaintance with the depravity of the human heart, and the defilement, which thence flows into the conduct and conversation; and a discernment of the scriptural way of cleansing a guilty conscience and a polluted heart, will effectually wean a man from these human inventions.—The enlightened Christian will seek the grace of the Holy Spirit, to enable him to repress the evil imaginations and affections of his heart: as he is aware that the very "thought of wickedness is sin;" he will endeavour to mortify and purge out the sensual, malicious, unjust, covetous, envious, proud, and ambitious desires of his heart. He will seek deliverance from all enmity and hard thoughts of God; from all ingratitude, selfishness, and inordinate love even of lawful things. He will pray to be cleansed from every inclination which is inconsistent with piety, equity, sincerity, purity, and charity: and he will know, that if he be indeed purified from these, and such like inward evils, "which defile the man," he is certainly made partaker of that "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord;" and his grand object will then be, to increase more and more in faith and grace, from day to day.

V. 24—37. While Pharisees are left with decided disapprobation, the blessed Saviour manifests his compassion and love to humble sinners of the Gentiles; and all, who allow themselves to be "unworthy of the crumbs that fall from his table," may confidently call upon him for the food of his beloved children. Still he goes about to every place, to seek and save the lost: and neither the obscurity of his ministers, nor the opposition of his enemies, can prevent the discovery of his glory and grace. In like manner, it is our business to persevere in doing good, privately and in an unambitious manner; and "our labour of love" will not always be hid or misrepresented.—When sinners apply to Christ, in behalf of themselves and those who are dear to them, earnestly desiring deliverance by him from the oppression of the devil; they may have their faith and humility tried by delays and frowns, and be ready to conclude that the blessings are reserved for others, and will not be vouchsafed to them: but patient and humble waiting on Christ, by faith and prayer, will certainly prevail; nor shall any have cause to say, they have sought his face in vain. Thus one after another obtains the blessing, and declares the Saviour's love to others; and they too seek to him, in their trouble and distress. And though we find a great variety in the cases, the reception and the manner of relief, of those who came to him, when he was here below; yet, in one way or other, they all obtained the help which they sought. Thus it still is in the grand concerns of our souls: the compassionate Saviour still opens the deaf ear, and looses the stammering tongue: and when he speaks with divine authority, he opens the understanding and the heart to receive instruction, and the lips to show forth his praise. (Notes, Is. 35:5—7. John 9:4—7.) Whilst we then admire the grace and excellency of his character, and the power of his works, let us proclaim to all around us, that "he hath done all things well; he maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak."

(Notes, 3:1—5, v. 5. John 11:33—40.)—He seems to have left Dalmanutha, without either preaching or working miracles: for it is probable, that the people in general were greatly prejudiced against him by their false teachers.

V. 17—21. 'They who have their minds fixed on earthly things, are utterly blind as to heavenly things; though they be never so plainly set forth to them.' Beza.—Even the disciples were in some degree infected with the same carnal prejudices, which had entirely occupied the minds of the Pharisees and other Jews. Our Lord therefore "rebuked them sharply, that they might be sound in the faith." He intimated, that their dulness of understanding was marvellous and inexcusable, when all their advantages were considered. Were their hearts also so hard and their eyes so blind, that his continued instructions could not convince them of his purpose to raise their minds to spiritual and eternal objects, and guard them against false doctrines; and not to occupy them with minute outward distinctions and peculiarities? And could they be so unbelieving, as to doubt his power to feed them, after the astonishing miracles which they had so lately witnessed? (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1—9. 32—37, v. 33. 6:30—46. Matt. 13:14,15. 15:32—38. 16:5—12,21—23. Rom. 7:13,14. 1 Cor. 3:1—3.)

V. 22—26. St. Mark alone records this miracle.—This blind man was conducted by his friends to Jesus, when he was come to Bethsaida; yet he seems not to have been an inhabitant of that city. Our Lord, however, was pleased to restore him to sight in an unusual method: perhaps, in order gradually to increase his faith, and to raise his expectation: but it also illustrated the manner in which he often enlightens the souls of men. (Notes, 7:31—36. Is. 42:13—17, v. 16. John 9:4—7.) "He took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town;" not only that he might work the miracle in a more private manner, but probably to mark his disapprobation of the unbelief and wickedness of the inhabitants. (Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) He then spat on his eyes, and laid his hands on him; (as intimating that the power came from him, whatever external sign was used;) and inquired, if he could see any thing: and the man answered, that "he saw men, as trees walking." He could see the people walking at a distance, and their motion satisfied him that they were men; or else he would not have been able to distinguish them from the trees, which he dimly saw at the same time. "I see men walking, as trees." Our Lord, having again laid his hands upon his eyes, and made him look up, his sight was completely restored: and he then ordered him to return home, and not enter into Bethsaida, or tell any one there of his being restored; as they were unworthy to receive any more attestations of divine power and goodness, having already withstood so many. V. 27—30. (Notes, Matt. 16:13—20.) 'As the ancients, with general consent, record that this history was dictated by the apostle Peter to Mark; who can believe that either Peter, or Mark, would have omitted that expression "Thou art Peter, &c." if they had thought that the foundation of the Christian church was placed in these words? ... Many praise Christ who yet rob him of his true honour.' Beza.—Charged, &c. (30) The premature and unreserved avowal of this truth must, without perpetual miracles, have excited the ill-judging multitude to such measures, as would have given the scribes and priests an occasion against Jesus, and even have rendered the Romans jealous of his popularity. It was therefore highly proper, that he should in the most peremptory manner forbid the disciples to declare openly that he was the Messiah. Let the people gradually collect it, by comparing his miracles and doctrine with the Scriptures: as they became better acquainted with the true nature of the Messiah's kingdom and salvation. Called. (34) The preceding discourse seems to have been delivered to the disciples in the absence of the multitude: but Christ, having an exhortation of universal interest to give, called to him the people, who were at some distance, that they also might hearken, and be instructed by it.

him, with his disciples also, he said unto them, [l]Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and [m]take up his cross, and [n]follow me.

35 For whosoever [o]will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life [p]for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it.

CHAPTER IX.

The transfiguration of Christ, 1—10. He shows that John the Baptist is "Elias who was to come," 11—13. He casts out a dumb and deaf spirit, having rebuked the company, and the disciples, for their unbelief, 14—29. He foretells his own death and resurrection, 30—32; reproves the ambition of the disciples, 33—37; forbids them to hinder one, who cast out devils in his name, though he followed not with them, 38—41; shows the guilt of offending weak believers, 42; and warns his hearers to part with all occasions of sin however valued; showing the eternal doom of the wicked, especially of apostates, in most awful language, 43—50.

AND he said unto them, Verily I say unto you, [a]that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not [b]taste of death, till they have seen [c]the kingdom of God come with power.

2 ¶ And [d]after six days, Jesus taketh with him [e]Peter, and James, and John, and leadeth them up into [f]an high mountain apart by themselves: and he was [g]transfigured before them.

The gospel's sake. (35) This is not found in Matthew. He who loses his life for the sake of the true gospel of Christ, loses it "for Christ's sake:" but if he dies by adhering to "another gospel," the case is far different. It is then of no ordinary importance to determine what is the gospel of Christ, and what is "another gospel." (Note, Gal. 1:6—10.)—If, as some learned men think, the word (ψυχη) rendered "soul," (36, 37.) should be translated life; it must certainly be the office of the expositor, to show that the life, or salvation, of the soul is meant; else how can he, who "loses his life for Christ's sake," "save his life?" (Note, John 12:23—26.)

V. 38. (Notes, Is. 51:7,8. 53:2,3. Matt. 5:10—12. 10:32, 33. Acts 5:41,42. 2 Tim. 1:6—8,11,12. Heb. 11:24—26. 12:2,3. 13:9—14. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) That the fear of imprisonment or death should terrify others, as it did Peter, to deny Christ, could not be at all incredible: but that any should "be ashamed" of him, whom all angels worship, and in whom all the inhabitants of heaven glory, must before the event have appeared inconceivable; except to those who had a deep knowledge of human nature, and experience of the deceitfulness of their own hearts. Yet perhaps there is no sin, to which every convert to true Christianity is more powerfully tempted; and no temptation, which induces such large numbers to act, habitually, against the light and conviction of their own consciences, in order to escape the reproach and scorn of men, and often of their inferiors, dependents, and domestics! The propriety of this solemn warning is therefore manifest to all, who properly consider what passes under their own observation, in every rank and station in the community, nay even in the church, in countries professing Christianity. For a bold avowal of our dependence on Christ, our expectations from him, and our obligations and devotedness to him, in the language and spirit of the Scripture, will not fail, in almost every circle, to expose us to scorn, and to the imputation of folly or enthusiasm: and the fear lest the Saviour and Judge should at last be ashamed of us, is the proper preservative from yielding to this temptation, in all those who desire above all things "to have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. Our compassionate Lord sometimes requires his followers to endure hardship in attending on him; but he relieves them before they faint under their burdens: and we should copy his example, in noticing the difficulties and wants of those around us, that we may obviate or remove them. But his love as much excels ours, as his power and all-sufficiency exceed our weakness and indigence. He will feed his hungry disciples with suitable provision, but they have no reason to expect luxuries from him; for these are generally lavished on the servants of another master.—Yet many professed Christians excuse themselves, on account of their poverty, from relieving the distressed, who would think it a hardship to dine with Jesus and his company on those provisions which he miraculously supplied!—The lively Christian, however, while his soul is feasted with the "hidden manna," will eat his mean morsel with thankfulness, and, by the blessing of God upon it, with better relish, than unthankful worldly men do their royal dainties. (Note, Rev. 2:17.)—Alas! what cause have we to groan and sigh because of those around us, who destroy themselves and others by their perverse and obstinate unbelief, and enmity to the gospel!—But we have great cause to be humbled and thankful on our own account; for the Lord has continual reason to reprove us also, for our remaining distrust and carnal apprehensions. How is it, that we no more see the glory of his truths, the privileges of his kingdom, the security of his word, the spirituality of his precepts? How is it, that we so often mistake his meaning, disregard his warnings, and distrust his providence? Alas! these things arise from the remains of that same leaven, which wholly prevails in the hearts of unbelievers. Let us then watch against it: and let us beseech the Lord to remove from us 'all hardness of heart,' and blindness of understanding; that we may perceive, hear, and remember his truths and precepts, and be thankful for all his multiplied kindnesses to us.

V. 22—38. The Lord in general illuminates our minds gradually; and he works by means, which are often no more than external signs of his efficacious operation. Thus he sometimes takes a poor blind sinner aside from the multitude, gradually removes the darkness from his understanding, and leads him to some indistinct views of spiritual things. This is his own work: he will perfect it, and we should wait his time. Let then all who desire this blessing, seek for it to Christ, "the Light of the world," in the use of the means appointed by him, and they shall not be disappointed. But while "the blind see out of obscurity," the proud, who reject his teaching, are given up to darkness and delusion; and even the means of instruction are in righteous judgment withdrawn from them.—The Lord will interrogate his followers on their proficiency: and his real disciples are distinguished by their honourable thoughts of him, and large expectations from him. He will approve of what we are enabled to speak or do in a proper manner: but we continually need to be taught further lessons, or to have our minds stirred up to remembrance, concerning his sufferings for us, and the self-denial which he requires from us. Our minds are by nature very averse to these humiliating and spiritual instructions: and even where some true knowledge, faith, and grace exists there may be, and often are, much ignorance, error, and remains of "the carnal mind."—As our Lord so sharply reproved Peter for objecting to his sufferings, which the glory of God and the salvation of his people required; we should by this be reminded, that those who would set us against self-denial, for the honour of our Lord, and the good of others, "savour the things that are of men, and not those that are of God." All people should therefore be called to observe, that they, who would go after Christ to heaven, must "deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow him:" and that they only are in the way of eternal happiness, who are willing to venture all, even their very lives, rather than deny Christ, or be ashamed of him in this evil world. Did we duly consider the worth and danger of our precious souls, for which no ransom could be found but the blood of Emmanuel, we should count the whole world contemptible, if the gain of it endangered our salvation; and the loss of life our greatest gain, if laid down for the sake of Christ and the gospel. May we then continually think of that season, when he will "come in the glory of the Father, with his holy angels," and may we now estimate every earthly object as we shall do on that important day! (P. O. Matt. 16:13—28.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1. (Notes, Matt. 16:24—28, v. 28.) 'This chiefly refers to the providential appearance of Christ for the destruction of Jerusalem.... Our Lord's manner) of speaking intimates, that most of the company should be dead before the event referred to: yet his ascension happened in a few months after.' Doddridge. Some interpret the passage of the successful preaching of the gospel after Christ's ascension, and the powerful establishment of his kingdom by means of it: but the reason assigned in this quotation seems conclusive, for interpreting it of his glorious appearance, in his providence, to remove the great hinderance to the full settlement of the Christian church, by destroying Jerusalem, and terminating the Jewish dispensation. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 13:24—31. Matt. 24:3,15—18,26—28. Luke 21:25—28. John 21:18—23.)

3 And [b]his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as [k]no fuller on earth can white them.

4 And there [l]appeared unto them [m]Elias with [n]Moses; and they were talking with Jesus.

5 And Peter answered and said to Jesus, Master, [o]it is good for us to be here: and let us make three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.

6 For [p]he wist not what to say; for they were sore afraid.

7 And there was [q]a cloud that overshadowed them: and a voice came out of the cloud, saying, [r]This is my beloved Son; [s]hear him.

8 And [t]suddenly, when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves.

9 And as they came down from the mountain, [u]he charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, [x]till the Son of man were risen from the dead.

10 And [y]they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another [z]what the rising from the dead should mean.

11 ¶ And they asked him, saying, [a]Why say the scribes that Elias must first come?

12 And he answered and told them, Elias verily cometh first, and [b]restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that [c]he must suffer many things, and be [d]set at nought.

13 But I say unto you, That [e]Elias is indeed come, [f]and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed; as it is written of him.

[Practical Observations.]

14 ¶ And [g]when he came to his disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and [h]the scribes questioning with them.

15 And straightway all the people, when they beheld him, [i]were greatly amazed, and running to him saluted him.

16 And he asked the scribes, [k]What question ye [*]with them?

17 And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, [l]I have brought unto thee my son, which hath [m]a dumb spirit:

18 And wheresoever he taketh him, he [†]teareth him; and he [n]foameth, and [o]gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away; and I spake to thy disciples that they should cast him out, [p]and they could not.

19 He answereth him, and saith, [q]O faithless generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him unto me.

20 And they brought him unto him: and when he saw him, straightway [r]the spirit tare him, and he fell on the ground, and wallowed, foaming.

21 And he asked his father, [s]How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child.

22 And oft-times it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters, to destroy him: but [t]if thou canst do any thing, [u]have compassion on us, and help us.

23 Jesus said unto him, [x]If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth.

24 And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said [y]with tears, Lord, I believe; [z]help thou mine unbelief.

But he lived many years amidst conflict and suffering, and died on a cross: yet tens and hundreds of thousands were saved by his means, to the glory of God by him! And was not this well worth his while? (Notes, Phil. 1:19—26. 2 Pet. 1:12—15.)

V. 10. Marg. Ref.—Questioning, &c.] The apostles argued with each other concerning their Lord's meaning, when he said, "Till the Son of man be risen from the dead." (9) Not that they did not believe a future resurrection, or had any peculiar difficulty concerning the common meaning of the words; for they had witnessed some instances of the dead being restored to life: but they were so prepossessed with prejudices against the Messiah's being cut off by death, and so assured that Jesus was the Messiah, that they supposed some figurative sense must be put on his words; for as they erroneously supposed he could not literally die, so he could not literally rise again. (Note, Luke 9:45.)—Nothing has more tended to induce false interpretations of Scripture, than a vain imagination that the literal meaning could not be true, because contrary to some notion, which, though no better than the prejudiced conclusion of a set of men, has been regarded as certain truth: and therefore allegorizing (called spiritual interpretation) must be adopted. But the grand wisdom and discernment of an expositor consists, in knowing what ought to be explained literally, and what must be interpreted figuratively. The papists explaining "This is my body" literally, and others allegorizing the parable, or story, of the good Samaritan, will show the attentive and judicious reader the importance of this remark. (Notes, Matt. 26:26—28. Luke 10:30—37.)

V 11—13. (Note, Matt. 17:10—13.) 'In answer to their other scruple, how the Son of man could die, he told them also from the Scriptures, how it was foretold that he should suffer many things. &c.' Whitby.

Restore, &c. (12) That is, bring back numbers from ungodliness to the true worship and service of God; as Elijah had done the Israelites from Baal to Jehovah. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Mal. 4:4—6. Luke 1:11—17.)—The thirteenth verse would be more readily understood, if translated as follows:—"Elias is indeed come, as it is written of him: and they have done to him whatsoever they listed." For this is the evident meaning of the words. It was not foretold, that the Messiah's forerunner would suffer martyrdom; and the scribes and priests did not put him to death: but it is plain, that they were well pleased, when he was thus taken off, and the conduct of the nation to so eminent a servant of God, showed what might be expected from them, against the Saviour whom he preceded.

V. 14, 15. Christ and the three apostles found the rest of the disciples surrounded with a multitude: for some scribes had taken that opportunity of disputing with them; hoping perhaps to perplex them, in the absence of their Master. (Marg. Ref. g, h.) But when Jesus appeared, the multitude, who had been listening to the debate, "were greatly amazed," probably by some remains of lustre visible in his countenance; for no other adequate reason of their surprise can be assigned: and running to him they saluted him, or expressed their cordial joy at seeing him again. 'Seeing some remainders of the splendour at his transfiguration in his visage.' Whitby. (Notes, Ex. 34:29—35. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.)

V. 16—24. (Notes, Matt. 17:14—18. Luke 9:37—44.) On our Lord's inquiry into the subject, on which the scribes were disputing with his disciples, one of the multitude addressed him in behalf of his son; who, as he stated it, was possessed with an evil spirit, which deprived him of speech and hearing: and often seized him with violence, dashing him upon the ground, and causing him to foam at the mouth, and "gnash with his teeth;" so that he pined away, as with continued wasting sickness.—This accords very much with the case of persons afflicted with the epilepsy; and hence some have ventured to assert, that it was no real possession: but does it not better become our ignorance, concerning the real causes of these maladies, to allow that at least the symptoms are aggravated by diabolical agency; than to suppose, that Christ, by word and deed, gave the most explicit 25 When Jesus saw that the people came running together, [a]he rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, [b]Thou dumb and deaf spirit, [c]I charge thee come out of him, and enter no more into him.

26 And the spirit [d]cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him: and he was as one dead; insomuch that many said, He is dead.

27 But Jesus [e]took him by the hand, and lifted him up, and he arose.

28 And when he was come into the house, his disciples [f]asked him privately, [g]Why could not we cast him out?

29 And he said unto them, [h]This kind can come forth by nothing but [i]by prayer and [k]fasting.

30 ¶ And they departed thence, and passed [l]through Galilee; [m]and he would not that any man should know it.

31 For he taught his disciples, and said unto them, [n]The Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill him; and after that he is killed, he shall rise the third day.

32 But [o]they understood not that saying, and [p]were afraid to ask him.

sanction to a vulgar error, and taught men to ascribe effects to the malice and power of apostate spirits which they had no agency in producing? This irreverence to the word of God, and to the Redeemer's sacred character, is very often the effect of pride and determined infidelity, in which Satan has far more influence, than such persons are willing in any thing to allow him.—In this calamity, the afflicted father had applied to the apostles to cast out the evil spirit; and it is probable, that their failure gave the scribes an occasion of questioning them concerning Jesus, and endeavouring to show that he was not the Messiah, or even a true prophet. Our Lord therefore answered the father of the youth, yet with reference to the scribes, the multitude, and even the disciples, who in different degrees were chargeable with very criminal unbelief; and he reproved them all together as an unbelieving generation, because they had not more enlarged apprehensions of his power and authority, notwithstanding all the miracles which he had wrought among them: and he inquired, how long he must be with them, to display his glory; and how long he must bear with their perverseness and incredulity, before they would be convinced that he was the Son of God, and that nothing was impossible to his omnipotence. (Notes, Num. 14:11,12. Heb. 3:7—19.) He then ordered the demoniac to be brought: upon which the evil spirit exerted his utmost malice and power, and dashed the young man on the ground, tearing him, and constraining him to wallow, or roll upon the earth, and foam in a dreadful manner. The question, "How long is it ago since this came upon him?" was probably intended to show the inveteracy of the case, to put the man's faith to a sharp trial, and to illustrate his own power. (Marg. Ref. 1—5. Note, John 5:5—9.) The father answered, that he had been so tormented from his childhood: and though he had hitherto been marvellously preserved; yet he had often been cast by the evil spirit into the fire, and into the water, apparently with the purpose of destroying him. So that the case had baffled every attempt hitherto made for his relief: but if Jesus "could do any thing," he entreated him to pity and help them. Our Lord then assured him, that in case "he could believe," the deliverance would certainly follow; seeing "all things were possible to him that believed." The event being thus suspended on the father's faith, so that the son could not fail of a cure except through his default; the former, feeling a vehement struggle in his mind between faith and unbelief, and fearing lest he should throw an impediment in the way, immediately cried out, with great earnestness, and with a flow of tears, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." He could scarcely believe that Jesus could cast out this powerful and obstinate evil spirit; and yet he concluded that he could enable him to believe, and inwardly assist him against unbelief! In effect he said, 'Lord, I do believe, and expect help from thee alone; but I am not able to exclude all doubting about it; but do thou first help me against my unbelief, and then deliver my afflicted child from his deplorable calamity.'—Where do we ever read of such an address to any prophet or apostle, in the whole Scripture? And who does not perceive, that such a request must have been highly reprehensible, if made to any mere man or creature? (Marg. Ref. 1—7. Notes, Luke 17:5,6. 24:44—49, v. 45. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. Phil. 4:10—13, v. 13. Heb. 12:2,3.)—"What is wanting to my faith, supply by thy goodness." For that he should hope for an increase of faith from Jesus, 33 ¶ And [q]he came to Capernaum: and being in the house, he asked them, [r]What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?

34 But they held their peace; for [s]by the way [s]they had disputed among themselves, who should be the greatest.

35 And he sat down, and called the twelve, and saith unto them, [t]If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all.

36 And [u]he took a child, and set him in the midst of them: and when he had taken him in his arms, he said unto them, 37 Whosoever shall [x]receive one of such children in my name, receiveth me: and whosoever shall [y]receive me, receiveth not me, but him that sent me.

38 ¶ And John answered him, saying, [z]Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not us; and we forbad him, because he followeth not us.

39 But Jesus said, [a]Forbid him not: for [b]there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can [c]lightly speak evil of me.

The multitude assembling, that they might witness the event, our Lord was pleased to rebuke the unclean spirit, and to charge him to come out of the young man, and to enter no more into him. This command the demon was unable to resist: but it filled him with torture and rancour; so that, crying out in a dreadful manner, he grievously tore the youth, before he left him; insomuch that the spectators supposed him to be dead: but when Jesus took him by the hand he arose, and was found to be perfectly recovered. former occasion; and which he perhaps now suspected to be blameable. They had met with a person who "cast out devils in the name" of Jesus: but as he did not statedly follow with them, and was not regularly sent forth, as the apostles and seventy disciples had been; they forbad him to proceed. This was the result of wrong apprehensions and remaining self-preference. Had not Christ secretly and effectually wrought by the man, he could not have succeeded in his attempt to cast out devils in his name: (Note, Acts 19:13—20.) they were, therefore, reprehensible in prohibiting him; especially without so much as asking their Lord's advice. Accordingly, Jesus warned them not to forbid any one on that account: as it was not likely, that he, who wrought undeniable miracles in his name, would easily be induced to disparage and vilify him or his cause; and all who were not engaged against them were, in the present circumstances, to be considered, as "on their part."—Working miracles in the name of Christ did not indeed prove a man to be a true believer: but, in the contest between the kingdom of God, and that of Satan, it showed, that, in this instance, a man fought under the banner of Christ, and against his enemies. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Num. 11:28,29. Matt. 12:29,30. Luke 9:46—50, v. 50. 1 Cor. 12:1—3. 2 Cor. 13:7—10. Phil. 1:15—18. 1 John 4:1—3.)—'God, the author of the ordinary vocation, acts in an extraordinary manner whenever he pleases: but the extraordinary vocation must be tried by the doctrine and the effects.' Beza.

Speak evil, &c. (39) Κακολογησαι. See on Matt. 15:4.

V. 41, 42. Instead of prohibiting those who aided in promoting the common cause, our Lord declared, that he would certainly recompense every one, who gave one of the least among his disciples so much as "a cup of water, because he belonged to him," the promised Messiah: on the contrary, whosoever injured, grieved, or stumbled the least of his disciples, would commit so grievous a crime, and be in danger of so great a punishment, that the most terrible death would be a much lighter evil, than that to which he would expose himself. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 18:5,6. Rom. 14:19—23. 1 Cor. 8:7—13.)

Ye belong to Christ. (41) Χριστου εστε, "Are Christ's." (1 Cor. 3:23. 15:23. 2 Cor. 10:7.) 'These words explain what the phrase "in the name of a disciple," in St. Matthew signifies.' Beza.

V. 43—50. (Notes, Matt. 5:29,30. 18:7—9.) These solemn warnings, as here introduced, seem especially to relate to the ambition and carnal expectations of the apostles, which misled them into many mistakes, both in judgment and practice. All such evil propensities must be mortified and "cut off," in order to their "entering into life," however painful the operation might be. The expressions are here much more strong and varied, than in any of the parallel passages. The hand, the foot, and the eye, are separately mentioned, as illustrative of the supposed value of the sacrifices to be made; and of the resolution, self-denial, and wisdom required in order to make them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i, k, n, p. Notes, Gen. 3:6. Deut. 13:6—11. Luke 14:25—27.) 'I saw Philip himself, with whom our contest was for rule and dominion, after having lost an eye, having had his hip broken, and being lamed in his hand and his leg, disposed, readily and easily, to part with any part of his body, which fortune might choose; so that, with the remainder, he might live in glory and honour.' Demosthenes. "They do it for a corruptible crown; but we for an incorruptible." (Note, 1 Cor. 9:24—27.)—It is repeatedly said, "Their worm never dieth," as well as that "the fire is never quenched." (Note, Is. 66:24.) Doubtless, remorse of conscience and keen self-reflection constitute this never-dying worm: so that the expression is alike contrary to the ideas of annihilation, and of final restitution to happiness; for, on either of these suppositions, "their worm" would die, and their torturing consciences would cease. And as the fire is doubtless at least an emblem of the wrath of God; its unquenchableness must denote, that his justice will never be satisfied, nor his anger turned away from those, who are cast into this fire of hell. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Is. 33:14. Matt. 3:11,12. 25:41—46. 2 Thes. 2:5—10, vv. 8, 9. Rev. 21:5—8, v. 8.)—The sacrifices under the law were commanded to be salted with salt. (Note, Lev. 2:13.) This was primarily an emblem of grace, which renders the sanctified soul meet for the enjoyment of its incorruptible inheritance; but it is also represented that "every sacrifice" to the divine justice "would be salted with fire;" the very nature of the punishment, or the righteous vengeance of God, will render the heirs of hell incorruptible: so that their misery will be as endless as the happiness of the righteous. 'Every wicked man shall be seasoned with fire itself, so as to become inconsumable, and shall endure for ever to be tormented: and therefore may be said to be "salted with fire," in allusion to that property of salt which is to preserve things from corruption.' Whitby.—In concluding this solemn subject, our Lord reminded the disciples, that as salt, though valuable in itself to season and preserve other bodies, was yet worthless and irrecoverable when it had lost its saltness: so they would become more vile and hopeless than others, if they were not truly sanctified: for they would be employed in converting and preserving others, and would have none to season them, should they turn aside. It would, therefore, be incumbent on them, to watch over their own hearts, to mortify their lusts, and, laying aside ambition, the fruitful parent of contention, to live at peace with each other. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, Matt. 5:13. Luke 14:34,35. Eph. 4:1—6,29—32. 5:1,2. Col. 4:5,6.)—'If the teachers themselves to whom is committed the administration of the divine word, with which men must be seasoned as with salt, ... do themselves become insipid, (not savouring of that holy word, in doctrine, spirit, and practice,) 'what remaineth, but either that the hearers perish, or that God should send other teachers?' Beza.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Those Christians who shall live in future times to behold "the kingdom of God come with power," and set up in all parts of the world, will enjoy a peculiar satisfaction, with which others have not been favoured: but though we shall "taste of death" before those happy days arrive; (Note, Heb. 2:5—9, v. 9.) yet we shall possess a still more exalted felicity, if admitted into those regions, where Jesus continually displays far brighter glories, than even on the mount of transfiguration. The pleasures of that divine vision must be unspeakably great; seeing the glimpses, which we now behold, as "through a glass darkly," sometimes so ravish our minds, that we are ready to cry out, "It is good for us to be here." (P. O. 1 Cor. 13:8—13.) But we should not expect such peculiar consolations to be abiding in this state of conflict and probation. We must now learn to hear, believe, love, and obey an unseen Saviour; to "walk by faith," and to wait in patient hope. We should seek conformity to him in holiness; and expect ere long to be with him, and like him in body and soul, where prophets and apostles, yea, and archangels, vie with each other, who shall most honour, adore, and praise his glorious majesty. In this hope, we may cheerfully pass through life and death; though we be often under a cloud, and ready to question what the meaning of his words and his appointments can be; and if we consider the way, in which Jesus and his servants have passed through this world to heaven; we shall be the less discouraged, should we be called to suffer many things, or be "set at nought," as the most despicable of mankind; if so be, that we may by any means attain unto eternal life. (Note, Phil. 3:8—11.)—The enemies of Christ always watch their opportunities of perplexing and disconcerting his disciples: their cavils and objections create much disquietude, to such as neglect to maintain a continual communion with their Lord: and perverse opponents often attack the unestablished, from a consciousness that they can make no impression on those, who are more fully confirmed and experienced. But the Lord will interpose to plead for his friends, and to silence the objections of his adversaries:

CHAPTER X.

Jesus teaches in Judea, 1; answers the Pharisees concerning divorces, 2—12: receives and blesses young children, 13—16; instructs and proves the rich young man; shows the danger of affluence; and makes gracious promises to those who forsake worldly objects for his sake, 17—31. He again predicts his own death and resurrection; reproves the ambition of James and John and the other apostles, 32—45; and gives sight to blind Bartimeus, 46—52.

AND [a]he arose from thence, and cometh into the coasts of Judea, [b]by the farther side of Jordan; and the people resort unto him again: and, as he was wont, [c]he taught them again.

2 ¶ And [d]the Pharisees came to him, and asked him, [e]Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? [f]tempting him.

3 And he answered and said unto them, [g]What did Moses command you?

4 And they said, [h]Moses suffered to write a bill of divorcement, and to put her away.

5 And Jesus answered and said unto them, [i]For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this precept:

6 But from [k]the beginning of the creation, [l]God made them male and female.

7 For [m]this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave to his wife,

8 And they twain shall be [n]one flesh: so then they are no more twain, but one flesh.

9 What [o]therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

10 And [p]in the house his disciples asked him again of the same matter.

11 And he saith unto them, [q]Whosoever shall put away his wife, and marry another, committeth adultery against her.

yet many seem zealously to welcome him and his ministers, who do not cordially believe and obey his gospel.

V. 14—29. In what varied ways does Satan with his angels attempt to render mankind miserable! Yet his chief success, among those who are favoured with the gospel, entirely arises from their unbelief: for if they had a clear apprehension of the power and grace of the Saviour, who "came to destroy the works of the devil," they would seek to him and obtain deliverance.—When our children or relatives are made wretched, useless, or mischievous, through the destructive influence of Satan, we should bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, earnestly beseeching him to "have compassion upon us and help us:" and we may do this for them, when they are incapable of receiving our instructions, or determined to disregard all our counsels. Ministers and Christians may be applied to on such occasions, and their counsel and prayers may be useful: but our dependence must rest on Christ alone; and should they conclude the case to be hopeless, we should still persist in expecting help from his almighty arm. But, alas! after all the displays which he has made of his power and love, and after all his patient teaching of us, by his word and our own experience, we are prone to form low expectations from him. Yet the things, which to all others are impossible, are easy with him.—Even in the case of those, who from their earliest years have been peculiarly enslaved by Satan, and have contracted various pernicious habits and fatal connexions; by means of which they have, as it were, "often been cast into the fire, and into the water," and have repeatedly been brought to the verge of destruction; we have abundant encouragement to expect help from the Saviour. He has hitherto bounded the rage of the enemy, and borne with the provocations of the sinner; and he can easily break the power of the former, and glorify himself in the salvation of the latter. Our chief danger, in every thing really good for us, arises from unbelief: "if we can believe, all things are possible to him that believeth:" and as we shall certainly find a difficulty in exercising such an unshaken faith in the power and grace of Christ, on many occasions; we should apply to him, "as the Author and Finisher of our faith," to strengthen us against unbelief; that we may not, through our own default, come short of the blessings which we seek, in behalf of ourselves or others. Indeed Satan will be very reluctant to be driven out of those who have long been his slaves: and when he cannot deceive or destroy the sinner, he will cause him as much trouble and terror as possible: so that when a man is about to experience a most blessed deliverance, he is often more harassed and distressed, than at any other time; and the beginnings of liberty and life resemble the very agonies of death.—Ministers would witness, and be the instruments of, more of those remarkable conversions, if they were stronger in faith, more fervent in prayer, and more entirely mortified to earthly pleasures and pursuits: and should we inquire of Jesus, why we have no more success "in turning sinners from the power of Satan unto God;" he would probably answer, "Because of your unbelief;" for this effect cannot be produced "except by fasting and prayer."

V. 30—50. While the Saviour teaches most plainly those things which relate to his love and grace, his sufferings and death, his present glory and future coming to judgment; men in general are so blinded by prejudice, that they do not understand his sayings: and by various hinderances they are frequently deterred from praying for divine illumination. Even disciples are often more ready to dispute with each other, "which shall be the greatest;" than with humble simplicity to sit at his feet, and learn the doctrine of the cross, "by which the world" must be "crucified to them, and they unto the world:" (Note, Gal. 6:11—14.) and we all need repeated rebukes, before we are made willing to seek wisdom by becoming "as little children," and to aspire after greatness by stooping to "be the least of all, and the servants of all." Yet disciples of this character are most dear to their Lord, and will be most honoured by him, as his messengers to mankind: and "whosoever receiveth one of them in Christ's name, receiveth" both "him and the Father who sent him."—Pride and bigotry are great hinderances to usefulness: men often think the interests of a party, or the credit of their order, of more importance than the cause of godliness: they are ready, by an assumed presumptuous authority, to forbid others "to cast out devils in the name of Christ," "because they follow not with them:" and even to grieve when evident good is done, if it be not managed according to their notions of regularity, and by those who are commissioned and sent forth in their way. Whereas all who believe, love, serve, and honour Christ are of one side: "he that is not against us is on our part;" and if sinners be brought to repent, to believe in the Saviour, and to lead sober, righteous, and godly lives, we must perceive that the Lord works by the preacher; and who are we, that we should attempt to silence him? While, therefore, we are encouraged to do good to others "for his name's sake," and especially to those who belong to him, assured that such services shall not lose their reward; let us also favour all who appear to be on his side in this evil world, and be glad to show our concurrence with them: and let us dread, even worse than death, any thing which can tend to injure and grieve them, or hinder their usefulness.—Instead of acrimony against those who "follow not with us," let us bend all our severity against our own evil propensities and habits: not sparing one of them, though it has been as a hand, a foot, or an eye unto us: or however painful we may find the mortification of it. Thus we shall be assured of "entering into life," and be preserved from the most distant fear of being "cast into hell, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."—And surely it would be infinitely better to undergo all possible pain, self-denial, and hardship here, and so be for ever happy hereafter; than to enjoy all worldly pleasure for a season, and then to be for ever miserable! (P. O. Matt. 16:21—28.) If then the difficulty and pain of mortifying every sinful inclination, and subduing every bad habit, appear to any man very great; if the worldly advantages to be renounced appear very valuable; let him consider the awful alternative. For eternity is before us: incorruptible in holiness and happiness, or in sin and misery, we must be: either sacrifices to God's justice to be "salted with fire," or living willing sacrifices to his honour, by the sanctification of the Spirit of Christ, and through the redemption of his blood. We have indeed the name of Christians: some of us preach, and many others profess, the truths of the gospel; and we are thus "the salt of the earth." If we then answer to our character, we shall be useful here and happy for ever: but if we remain destitute of the grace of God, our name, our profession, or our sacred function, will only serve to aggravate our guilt, and increase our condemnation. Let us then lay aside every carnal and ambitious project and pursuit: let us "look diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God:" and "let us follow after peace and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." (Notes, Heb. 12:14—17.)

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1. Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 19:1,2.

V. 2—12. (Notes, Matt. 19:3—12.) 'This seeming difference' (between this account and that in Matthew's gospel,) 'may be removed by saying, They first asked him, "Why did Moses command?" And then our Saviour asked them, 'What were the words of Moses in this case? And when they had repeated them, he tells them the reason why Moses gave them this permission.' Whitby.—It is here added, "If a woman shall put away her husband, and be married to another, &c." (12) This case, which often occurred among the Romans, and sometimes even among the Jews, (having been introduced by Salome, sister to Herod the Great, who sent a bill of divorce to her husband, Costobarus; and her example was followed by Herodias and others,) serves to confirm the conclusion, that our Lord intended to put men 13 ¶ And [r]they brought young children to him, that he should touch them; and his [s]disciples rebuked those that brought them.

14 But when Jesus saw it, [t]he was much displeased, and said unto them, [u]Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; [x]for of such is the kingdom of God.

15 Verily I say unto you, [y]Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he [z]shall not enter therein.

16 And [a]he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them.

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ And [b]when he was gone forth into the way, there came one [c]running, and [d]kneeled to him, and asked him, [e]Good Master, [f]what shall I do that I may inherit [g]eternal life?

18 And Jesus said unto him, [h]Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, [i]that is God.

19 Thou [k]knowest the commandments, [l]Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, [m]Defraud not, Honour thy father and mother.

20 And he answered and said unto him, Master, [n]all these have I observed from my youth.

21 Then Jesus, beholding him, [o]loved him, and said unto him, [p]One thing thou lackest: go thy way, [q]sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have [r]treasure in heaven: and come, [s]take up the cross, and follow me.

22 And he was [t]sad at that saying, and went away grieved: [u]for he had great possessions.

23 And Jesus [v]looked round about, and said unto his disciples, [x]How hardly shall they that have riches [y]enter into the kingdom of God!

24 And the disciples were [z]astonished at his words. But Jesus answereth again, and saith unto them, [a]Children, how hard is it for them that [b]trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!

25 It is [c]easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

26 And they were astonished [d]out of measure, saying among themselves, [e]Who then can be saved?

27 And Jesus, looking upon them, saith, [f]With men it is impossible, but not with God: [g]for with God all things are possible.

28 Then Peter began to say unto him, [h]Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee.

29 And Jesus answered and said, Verily I say unto you, [i]There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, [k]for my sake, and the gospel's, 30 But he shall receive [l]an hundred-fold now in this time, houses and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, [m]with persecutions; and in the world to come [e]eternal life.

31 But [o]many that are first shall be last, and the last first.

and women exactly on the same footing in this matter: so that the same conduct is in the man adultery against his wife, which in the woman is adultery against her husband. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. Luke 16:16—18.1 Cor. 7:1—9.)—"Though this discourse be originally about divorce, yet it seems plainly to evince, that polygamy must be unlawful under the Christian economy. For, from Christ's saying, "He that putteth away his wife, and marries another, committeth adultery against her;" it clearly follows, that he who having not put her away, marries another, must be guilty of the same crime; seeing he must have at least the same power to marry another, when the first is put away, as when she is not. ... Since to commit adultery is to violate the bed of another person, he that commits adultery against his wife, must violate her bed; which no husband can do, only by doing that which a husband lawfully might do. ... Since then a right to polygamy is a right to marry more wives than one, he that hath this right cannot violate the bed of his first wife, by assuming another to it. It must therefore be acknowledged, either that the husband, under Christ's institution, and by the original law of matrimony, had no such right; or that he that marrieth another, cannot by that commit adultery against his first wife.' Whitby.—The Old Testament nowhere suggests the idea of a husband committing adultery against his wife. (Note, 1 Cor. 7:1—5.)

Hardness of heart. (5) Σκληροκαρδιλα. See on Matt. 19:8. The original word does not mean cruelty, in its primary signification, but an obstinate untractable disposition: yet cruelty to those who stand in the way of a man's self-will, naturally springs from this state of mind and heart.—For remarks on other Greek words in the passage, see on Matt. 5:31,32. 19:3—12.

V. 13—16. (Notes, Matt. 19:13—15. Luke 18:15—17.)—'Christ's showing his regard in such a manner to the children, not only must have been exceedingly pleasing to the parents; but the memory of this condescension might make tender and lasting impressions on the children themselves; and the sight must be very edifying and encouraging to other young persons, who might happen to be present. ... Nicephorus tells, that the celebrated Ignatius, afterwards bishop of Antioch, was one of these infants. Our Lord might reasonably be the more displeased with the disciples, for endeavouring to prevent their being brought; as he had so lately set a child among them, and insisted on the necessity of their being made conformable to it.' Doddridge.—The language in this gospel is more emphatical than that in St. Matthew: and it must be obvious, that the exhortations and instructions which might have been addressed both to the parents and the children, and by the parents to their children, as a subsequent improvement of the transaction, must have been in many respects similar to those which may be grounded on infant baptism, when duly improved. The passage, therefore, though not a direct proof, has surely a favourable aspect towards bringing our infant offspring to Christ, seeking his blessing on them, and devoting them to his service, in this sacrament; provided it be done intelligently and uprightly.—"He took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them." What Christian parent does not beseech him thus to 'embrace his children in the arms of his mercy, to lay his hands on them and bless them?' And is not this the language of parents in presenting their children for baptism, if rightly understood and attended to? (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. 48:14—16. Is. 40:9—11. Matt. 18.1—6, 10,11. John 3:3—6.)

V. 17—31. Notes, Matt. 19:16—30. Luke 18:18—30.—Good Master. (17) It is said that the Rabbies affected this title, which shows the peculiar propriety of our Lord's answer.—Defraud not. (19) This is supposed by some expositors to be here substituted, instead of the tenth commandment; yet that is far more extensive in its requirement. (Notes, Ex. 20:17. Rom. 7:7,8.)—'Surely all endeavours to defraud show a very covetous mind; inclining us, against the dictates of our consciences, and to the damage of our precious souls, to defraud another of his right. ... The word ... signifies also, to detain, and keep back a thing when it is due. ... And surely they who desire thus to detain that which belongs to others, and they know they much want, must covet to have at that time what is another's. ... He pays less than he ought, who pays not in due time.' Whitby. (Notes, Ex. 20:17. 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 8—10.)—Loved him. (21) There was a natural amiableness in this young ruler, compared with the base conduct of the scribes, Pharisees, and many others, which excited our Lord's compassion; and as he was like us in all things, sin excepted, we may suppose that he felt that tender regard for him, which pious ministers do for some in their congregations, who appear amiable, moral, and benevolent, but whom they do not consider at present as truly religious.—Take up thy cross. (21) Notes, Matt. 16:24—28, v. 24. Luke 9:18—27, v. 23. "The cross," is some trial or suffering which might be avoided by turning out of the way of duty, but cannot otherwise: as the cross lay in our Lord's

As our Lord and his disciples were on their last journey to Jerusalem; being aware of the inveterate malice of his enemies, and of their designs against his life, and having heard many intimations of his approaching sufferings, they were exceedingly amazed at his resolution; and followed him with great fear of the dangers to which they too were likely to be exposed. (Note, John 11:11—16.) He was therefore pleased again more particularly to declare to them the sufferings, which he was shortly to endure; that, witnessing the calm intrepidity with which he met them, they might be prepared for their share of the trial, and be encouraged to expect a happy event. But it does not appear that they properly attended to his words; though they are so plain as to need no interpretation, except the history of their accomplishment. (*Marg. Ref. 'They that, among the Gentiles, do exercise rule over them, receive advantages from their subjects, are served and maintained in all their grandeur and splendour by them: but in the authority which I shall confer on you and your successors, it shall be quite otherwise: ye shall attend and wait upon them whose rulers ye are. In Matthew, "Let him be your servant:" here, "He shall be servant of all."

V. 46—52. (Matt. 20:29—34. Note, Luke 18:35—43.) St. Matthew mentions two blind men, who received sight on this occasion; probably the other was excited to apply to Jesus by Bartimeus's example, and was much less known. Both Matthew and Mark record the miracle, as wrought when Jesus "went out of Jericho;" but Luke says, it took place "when he was come nigh to Jericho," and he afterwards records an event which took place in that city. (Note, Luke 19:1—10.) He seems, however, only to mean that the miracle was performed when he was near Jericho: for it is not improbable that Jesus stayed some days in that neighbourhood; and this occurred, as he went out of the city during that time, though perhaps he returned thither again.—Our Lord, attended by his disciples and surrounded by the multitude, came to a place, where a man, well known in those parts, "sat by the wayside begging." This person had no doubt previously heard of him and his miracles; and believed that he was the promised Messiah, by comparing these reports, with what he had read while he had his eyesight, or had heard from the prophecies of Scripture on that subject. (Notes, Is. 29:17—19. 35:5—7.) It is computed by the harmonists, that the man born blind was restored to sight before this time. (Notes, John 9:) Inquiring, therefore, what the great concourse of people meant; he learned that "Jesus of Nazareth was passing by:" and immediately he conceived the hope of recovering his sight by miracle. Accordingly, without delay or hesitation, he cried out, saying, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy upon me." Our Lord might perhaps be then engaged in discourse with his attendants: and as Bartimeus was a mean person, and his application appeared rude and clamorous, "many charged him to hold his peace." He was, however, too much in earnest in seizing the present opportunity of craving so greatly desired a blessing to be thus silenced: on the contrary, he "cried out a great deal" more loudly and incessantly, "Thou Son of David, have mercy upon me." (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Gen. 32:24—30. Matt. 15:21—28.) At length our Lord stood still, and ordered the blind man to be conducted to him and some encouraged him to expect a cure, as Jesus nad expressly called him. Accordingly, he cast away his upper garment, as in haste, and desiring to be rid of every encumbrance. Thus he came to Jesus, who asked him, "What wilt thou that I should do to thee?" He well knew what Bartimeus wanted; but he chose to hear it from his own lips, as the language of faith, dependence, and expectation. When therefore the man had answered, "Lord, that I might receive my sight;" Jesus said to him, "Go thy way," or depart in peace; "thy faith hath made thee whole:" or, "hath saved thee." His faith procured from Jesus the opening of his eyes, and there can be no reasonable doubt, the salvation of his soul also. "Immediately he received sight;" but instead of departing, he joined the multitude, and followed Jesus in the way, full of joy and gratitude, and glorifying God for the mercy which he had received; and all the people joined him in praising God for what had been done. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—h. Note, Matt. 9:27—29.) Bartimeus signifies, in Syriac, the son of Timeus. Some think, that he was thus specially mentioned by name, because he afterwards became of note among our Lord's disciples.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. Our blessed Lord hath given his ministers an example of being "instant in season and out of season," in "preaching the word," whenever or wherever the people are disposed to hear it; and notwithstanding the perverseness and malice of those who "watch for their halting."—We should expect to be frequently proved with ensnaring questions, from Pharisees and infidels; and we should study to be expert in answering them pertinently, and in "the meekness of wisdom." (Notes, Prov. 26:4,5. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) In general, our appeal must be to the plain testimony of God's word: yet in applying texts of Scripture to particular cases, an accurate attention to the meaning and design of the sacred writer is absolutely necessary; and many distinctions must be noted, between temporary appointments or allowances, "because of the hardness of men's hearts," or with reference to peculiar circumstances; and those truths and precepts, which are of universal and immutable importance and obligation. For it is evident in fact, that almost all errors in doctrine and practice have been grounded on wrong conclusions from detached texts, either misinterpreted, or misapplied to cases to which they have no relation. But the humble, teachable, and unprejudiced, who love the truths and ways of God, and depend on the teaching of the Holy Spirit, will be conducted safe through such difficulties as are absolutely insurmountable to those, who "lean to their own understandings."—True religion will teach us our duty in every relation of life, and render us comfortable in ourselves, and blessings to each other in them: so that even those restrictions, which to carnal men appear intolerable, become easy and pleasant to the consistent Christian; and he considers the liberty and indulgence for which others contend, as the source of confusion, debasement, and misery.—Those, "whom God hath joined together," and taught to be helpers and blessings to each other, as having one common inseparable interest here, and as being "heirs together of the grace of life;" (Notes, Eph. 5:22—33. 1 Pet. 3:1—7.) if they have children, will bring them, by their united prayers, to Jesus, that he may impart his salvation to their souls: and he will be "much displeased with all," who would discourage them in so doing; for all men ought to be exhorted to seek his blessing on those with whom they are connected. (P. O. Matt. 19:1—15.) Even "little children should be suffered" and directed to go to the loving Saviour, as soon as they are capable of understanding his words: they should be assured that he will regard their lisping petitions; and all his ministers should copy his condescension, and attentive regard to the lambs of the flock, the young, the newly awakened, the weak believers, the poor, or the discouraged; that they may be his instruments in gathering them to him, and in leading them to establishment and comfort. (Note, Is. 40:9—11.) While we consider the case of children, and remember that "of such is the kingdom of God;" let us peculiarly attend to our Lord's declaration, that "whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child he shall not enter therein." No learned scribe, or philosopher, no man of the most distinguished learning, or pre-eminent abilities, can be a true subject of the kingdom of grace here, or an heir of the kingdom of glory hereafter, who will not stoop to receive the instructions and blessings of the kingdom, in the simple teachable spirit, with which a little child learns the first elements of knowledge, from its parent, nurse, or teacher. (Notes, Matt. 11:27.) "If any man therefore be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise" unto salvation: and, as scarcely any thing militates so much against this submission of the understanding to the divine teaching, this exercise of implicit faith in the word of God, and willing dependence on him, and unreserved subjection to his will in the appointments of his providence and the dispensations of his grace, as the pride of human wisdom; so not many of the wise and learned, any more than of the rich and noble, have hitherto been found among the followers of Christ. (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 3:18—23.)

V. 17—31. Whatever increases pride, and an attachment to the world, must enhance the difficulty of a man's embracing the gospel. If it were not the fixed determination of God, that "no flesh shall glory in his presence," the case of rulers, scribes, and Pharisees would be more hopeful. Many of them will call Jesus "Good Master;" seem to have serious thoughts about "eternal life;" and approve, and even profess exactly to obey, several of the commandments; but they do not understand the holiness of the divine character, the spirituality and extent of the holy law, the evil and desert of sin, their own deep guilt and depravity, the nature of salvation, or their need of the Redeemer's blood, righteousness, and regenerating Spirit. A sharp trial often proves even their moral goodness to be radically defective, and to be carnal selfishness in a more decent garb: so that self-denying, impoverishing duties no more suit their love of this present world, than the doctrines of grace do their self-complacency. They appear to be very sorry that they cannot reconcile the service of God and Mammon, and both obey Christ and keep the world: but they cannot think of leaving an earthly treasure, which they have in possession, for the hope of "a heavenly treasure" in reversion, by "taking up the cross and following Christ." All these evils are enhanced by increasing wealth: few can possess riches, without loving them and trusting in them; and it is extremely difficult to break the strong bands, which hold a carnal mind to large possessions. So that Jesus speaks to us "as to children," when he reminds us, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven!" And instead of expressing our astonishment, or indulging our speculations, let us learn contentment in a low estate: or if a higher be allotted us, let us watch against confidence in riches, and the love of them, or any thing that can be purchased with him. (Note, Prov. 30:7—9.) Let us pray to be enabled to part with every earthly object for Christ's sake; and to use all, which we are allowed to keep, in his service and as his faithful stewards: (Notes, and P. O. Luke 16:1—12.) and let us be encouraged to pray for the rich especially, and to employ all the means which we can for their good, remembering, "that with God all things are possible."—But, whatever our circumstances be, we shall be called on to prove the sincerity of our faith and love, by renouncing some temporal advantages for Christ's sake, if we profess to be his followers. The trial in this case may be sharp, but the recollection of having made the required sacrifice will afterwards "turn unto us for a testimony:" and to encourage us in so doing, we are assured of an immense compensation even in this present world, as well as of "eternal life in that to come." If we have true faith, we shall be satisfied with this security, and expect the promised blessing; and thus well-regulated, holy self-love will be reconciled to self-denial, renunciation of worldly objects, and persecutions for Christ's sake. But such trials lay open men's hearts, and thus the "first become last, and the last first." (P. O. Matt. 19:16—30. Luke 18:18—43.)

V. 32—45. Even disciples are often more disposed to be amazed at our Lord's contempt of the world, and patient endurance of poverty, hardship, contempt, suffering, and death for them; than to consider him as having "left them an example that they should follow his steps:" and though they do follow him, even when danger approaches; yet they do it fearfully, and with hesitation and reluctance. Indeed when we consider, that the holy Jesus endured every indignity and cruelty from Jewish priests and scribes, who delivered him up to the insults of Gentile rulers and soldiers, as a condemned malefactor; we cannot expect exemption from reproach and suffering, however prudent, blameless, or benevolent, our conduct may be: but the view of his glorious resurrection and exaltation may encourage a hope of a happy event to all our conflicts.—It is greatly to be lamented that "honour, glory, and immortality" in a future world, and obscurity, poverty, contempt, and persecution here, are but ill suited to the desires of most of those who are called Christians: nay, sanctification must be considerably advanced in us, before we shall be unreservedly reconciled to them. If Jesus were ready to gratify all our desires; it would soon appear, that we were aspiring to reputation, authority, popularity, or eminence among our brethren; and that we were unwilling to taste of his cup, or to have any measure of his baptism, if we could by any means avoid it. We should often ask for "we know not what," and should be effectually ruined by having our prayers answered. But he loves us more wisely than we love ourselves; and he will give us what is good for us, not what we foolishly hanker after.—We are indeed often keen-sighted

CHAPTER XI.

Jesus enters Jerusalem, riding on an ass, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, 1–11. He curses a barren fig-tree, 12–14; and drives the traders from the temple, 15–19. From the fig-tree being dried up, he shows his disciples the power of faith, and directs them how to pray, 20–26. He silences the priests and scribes, who questioned his authority, 27–33.

AND [a]when they came nigh to Jerusalem, unto Bethphage, and Bethany, [b]at the mount of Olives, [c]he sendeth forth two of his disciples,

2 And saith unto them, [d]Go your way into the village over against you; and as soon as ye be entered into it, ye shall find a colt tied, whereon [e]never man sat; loose him, and bring him.

3 And if any man say unto you, Why do ye this? say ye, [f]that the Lord hath need of him; [g]and straightway he will send him hither.

4 And they went their way, [g]and found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met; and they loose him.

5 And certain of them that stood there said unto them, What do ye loosing the colt?

6 And they said unto them even as Jesus had commanded: and they let them go.

7 And they brought [h]the colt to Jesus, [i]and cast their garments on him; and he sat upon him.

8 And many spread their garments in the way; and others [k]cut down branches off the trees, and strewed them in the way.

9 And they that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, [l]Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord:

10 Blessed be [m]the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna [n]in the highest.

11 And [o]Jesus entered into Jerusalem, and into the temple: and when he had looked round about upon all things, and now the eventide was come, [p]he went out unto Bethany, with the twelve.

12 ¶ And [q]on the morrow, when they were come from Bethany, [r]he was hungry:

13 And [s]seeing a fig-tree afar off, having leaves, he came, if [t]haply he might find any thing thereon: and when he came to it, he found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet.

14 And Jesus answered and said unto it, [u]No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And his disciples heard it.

15 ¶ And they come to Jerusalem: [x]and Jesus in discerning, and severe in reproving, the vainglory and ambition of our brethren; but prone to fall into the same faults in our competitions with them: yet our gracious Master gently rebukes and corrects us, and gradually represses and subdues our foolish desires of pre-eminence. He teaches us to leave lordly authority, vain distinctions, and the praise of men, to Gentiles and nominal disciples; and to follow him, in aspiring after true greatness, by self-abasement, serviceableness, and a readiness to labour and suffer in any way, however obscure and disregarded, by which we improve our talent to the glory of God and the good of the souls of men. (P. O. Matt. 20:17—34.)

V. 46—52. Whilst enlightened believers are admonished daily to "behold the glory of their Lord," till they are more completely changed into his image; let sinners be exhorted to imitate blind Bartimeus.—As long as men are favoured with the use of their eyes, how diligent should they be, in searching the Scriptures, and storing their memories with them; that if visited with blindness, they may have something treasured up, on which they may profitably meditate, and with which they may compare what they hear, either from preachers, or concerning them! And when the Lord deprives any of the use of one sense, how diligent should they be in improving those which they still enjoy!—In these respects, this interesting narrative sets before us an instructive and encouraging example.—If the eyes of men's understandings are not opened to behold the preciousness of Christ, and the beauty of holiness; they are shut up under a far more dreadful darkness, and precluded from far more delightful prospects and exquisite pleasures, in respect of the spiritual world, than any blind man in respect of the natural. But where the gospel is preached, or the written word vouchsafed, and men are able to read it, Jesus is passing by; and this is the sinner's opportunity. Though he cannot at present understand the doctrine of Christ, or see his glory; yet let him as a perishing sinner cry after him, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me." And if any man attempt to dissuade, deride, and reproach him, or to threaten him into silence, let him take occasion from thence to cry the more earnestly for salvation. In this way the Saviour will notice him; and his invitations and promises will, as it were, direct him to be called. We too should delight in encouraging inquiring souls, and in exhorting them to "be of good comfort," while they arise and go to Jesus, who calls them by his word, and "will in nowise cast them out." In seeking to him, all delay must be avoided, and every impediment laid aside; and he will, as it were, inquire of us, what we would have. We should therefore study to get acquainted with our own wants, and with his promises, that we may have our answer ready, and find liberty and earnestness in prayer. We cannot indeed see him, as blind Bartimeus could not, when he sought mercy from him: but he is ever present with us; and by faith we realize that presence, and address our requests to him, which he never fails to answer. Thus faith brings salvation from Christ unto men's souls; and they join the company of his disciples, in showing forth his praises, and in walking in his most holy ways. (Notes, 1 Pet. 2:9—12.)

(2) 'The exact knowledge, which our Lord showed, of so many minute and most fortuitous particulars, must surely impress the minds of these messengers greatly, and establish the faith of his followers. It is observable, that many such things occurred a little before his death, which, considered in this view, have a peculiar beauty. V. 12—14. Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 21:17—20.—The time, &c. (13) It is evident that the fruit on the common fig-trees, must have been utterly unfit for food, at this early season of the year: for though the fig-tree puts forth its blossom before the leaves: yet the fruit must have been very small at the passover, which is said by the Jewish writers to be five months before the time of ripe figs. (Note, Matt. 24:32—35, v. 32.) It has been said, that our Lord found only leaves, and no fruit of any kind, and therefore this must have been a barren tree; for if no fruit were at this time set, there could be none that year. But this could be no reason why he should, when hungry, seek fruit on it to eat; as there could have been none fit for use, however fruitful it might promise to be. The following quotation seems to contain the true solution of the difficulty.—'Let it be noted, that St. Mark doth not by these words, "for the time of figs was not yet," assign a reason why our Lord found no figs upon the tree; but why he went to this one tree, which had leaves on it, and so was of that kind of figs, which, saith Theophrastus, was ει φυλλον, semper comantibus foliis; a fig-tree, that had always leaves; and why he expected to find fruit on that tree, which upon the ordinary fig-trees abounding there, he could not expect, the time of ordinary figs not being yet. For this kind of fig-tree, being ever green with leaves, hath, saith Theophrastus, αμα και τον ενον και τον νεον καρπον, old and new fruit hanging on it together; the fruit of the year past and present, say the Jewish doctors. Accordingly, Julian the apostate, speaking of the fruit of Damascus, saith, some of them were but of a short duration; ... only the fig-tree carries its fruit above a year, and it hangs on with the fruit of the following year.' Whitby. (Note, Is. 28:1—4, v. 4.)—The fig-trees, in England, seem in general to be of this kind, though the frost kills their leaves; but the case in Judea was different: so that the time of ripe figs, on the ordinary fig-trees, was not come; but fruit might have been expected on this tree, because its leaves showed it to be of the other species. Thus it was an apt emblem of the Jewish nation, whose profession of true religion gave an expectation of fruit; though none could have been looked for among the Gentiles. But as this expectation was not answered, the nation was rejected, and has ever since continued unfruitful. (Notes, Jer. 8:13. Luke 13:6—9. Heb. 6:7,8. Rev. 22:10—12.)

20 ¶ And in the morning, as they passed by, [f]they saw the fig-tree dried up from the roots.

21 And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Master, behold, the fig-tree which thou [g]cursedst is withered away!

22 And Jesus answering, saith unto them, [h]Have [i]faith in God.

23 For verily I say unto you, That [j]whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, [k]and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass; he shall have [l]whatsoever he saith.

26 But if ye do not forgive, neither will your Father which is in heaven forgive your trespasses.

27 ¶ And they come again to Jerusalem: and, [o]as he was walking in the temple, there come to him [p]the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders, 28 And say unto him, [q]By what authority doest thou these things? and who gave thee this authority to do these things?

29 And Jesus answered and said unto them [r]I will also ask of you one [i]question, and answer me, and I will tell you by what authority I do these things.

30 The [s]baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men? answer me.

31 And they reasoned with themselves, saying, If we shall say, From heaven, he will say, [t]Why then did ye not believe him?

32 But if we shall say, Of men; [u]they feared the people: [x]for all men counted John, that he was a prophet indeed.

33 And they answered and said unto Jesus, [y]We cannot tell. And Jesus answering, saith unto them, [z]Neither do I tell you by what authority I do these things.

(16) This circumstance is not mentioned by Matthew; and it rather favours the supposition, that Christ purged the temple two days successively; and more completely the second day than before. In order to vindicate the sanctity of that holy place, and to keep up the distinction between its sacred services and all kinds of secular business; he would not suffer any man on whatever pretence to carry a vessel, or burden through its courts. (Marg. Ref. Note, John 2:13—17.)—Of all, &c. (17) It would be more properly rendered, "for all nations." Not that all nations would call it so; but, men out of all nations, who should come to it, as the centre of the worship of the true God, uprightly to pray to him, would be accepted, and such ought to have been encouraged.

The temple. (15,16) To ἱερον, signifies the temple, with all the courts and adjacent buildings. Ὁ ναος, the sanctuary, consisting of "the holy place," into which none but the priests were allowed to enter; and the most holy place within the veil.—Of all nations. (17) Πασι τοις εθνεσιν, "to, or for, all nations." Exact from Is. 56:7. Sept.

V. 18, 19. Marg. Ref. b, e. Note, Matt. 21:14—16.

V. 20—26. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 12—14. Matt. 21:17—22. Luke 13:6—9.) The apostles were exhorted to have "faith in God," or, "the faith of God;" (marg.) that is, a firm confidence in his power and truth, as enabling them to effect those things which they undertook in his name. This was peculiarly applicable to that faith required in working miracles. 'These were generally introduced by some solemn declaration of what was intended, which was in effect a prediction of immediate success. So Peter says, (Acts 3:6,) "In the name of Jesus Christ rise up, and walk;" and (9,34.) "Eneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole." And in pronouncing this, the person speaking pawned all his credit as a messenger from God, and consequently all the honour and usefulness of his future life, on the immediate miraculous energy to attend his words, and to be visibly exerted on his uttering them. Hence it is, that such a firm courageous faith is so often urged on those, to whom such miraculous powers were given.' Doddridge. This ought not, however, to be considered as the exclusive meaning of the exhortation, which should also be kept in mind in all our expectations and prayers, grounded on the promises of God, which will certainly be fulfilled to every believer, in the proper meaning of them, and in the due season; and this we ought to expect, notwithstanding all difficulties and apparent improbabilities. (Notes, Jam. 1:5—8. 1 John 5:14, 15.) Therefore, "whatever we desire, according to the will of God," made known by his precepts and promises, we should when we pray for it confidently hope to receive, and go on with our duty as though we had received it.—But if we would thus have confidence in prayer before a holy God, we must have an assured hope of his merciful forgiveness; in order to which we must fully and heartily forgive all that have injured us. (Notes. Matt. 6:12 14 15. 18:21—35. Luke 17:3—5. 1 Tim. 2:8—10, v. 8. 1 John 3:18—24.)—Standing seems to have been a frequent posture in prayer among the Jews; (Marg. Ref. m.) though kneeling is far the most sanctioned by the example of Christ and his apostles, and indeed in most parts of the Old Testament.

V. 27—33. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 21:23—32. Luke 20:1—8.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19. We should learn from our divine Master to meet sufferings, in a good cause, with constancy and alacrity; and to be bold and open in our profession of the truth, in proportion as its enemies grow virulent and determined in opposition.—The undeniable proofs which he gave during his humiliation on earth, of his knowledge of all events, and his influence over all hearts, should inspire us with implicit confidence, and excite us to unreserved and prompt obedience: for we shall find all his words true and faithful, and he will carry us through all difficulties and reproaches, with which we can meet in his service.—It is a peculiar honour and felicity to be instrumental, in any way, to the display of his glory. His "kingdom is not of this world," and therefore its external appearance is often mean; and its subjects and ministers must not affect worldly grandeur, or be ashamed of appearing poor, and even despicable in the eyes of carnal men: but "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost," are their privileges, which are of more value than all earthly honours and riches, however abundant. These blessings we should seek for ourselves, in the first place, with decided preference above all other things, and then aim to communicate them to others: and we ought to welcome all those, who "come in the name of the Lord," to promote the peace and prosperity of his kingdom, rejoicing greatly on account of their success in this good work.—While we expect the great Head of the church effectually to purge it from all hirelings and abuses, that it may no more be reproached as "a den of robbers," (P. O. Rev. 18:9—19.) but may be indeed "a house of prayer" and spiritual worship, "to all nations;" how active should rulers and teachers be, in doing what they can to promote the scriptural administration of his ordinances, the sanctification of his holy day, and the faithful preaching of his word; and to establish and maintain a decided distinction between things sacred and secular! And at how great a distance should all, who love and preach the truth, keep from every appearance of turning their ministry into a lucrative trade!—Alas! that chief priests, scribes, and elders should so frequently be the most inveterate opposers of reformation, from a mistaken regard to their own interests and reputation, which in fact they thus undermine and destroy! Men of this character and spirit set themselves against the truth, for fear of the consequences of its getting ground, when they find the people attentive and impressed. Thus they enter on a contest, from which they cannot recede with credit, and in which

The parable of the vineyard let out to wicked husbandmen, 1—12. Jesus answers the Pharisees and Herodians about paying tribute to Cæsar, 13—17; the Sadducees, concerning the resurrection, 18—27; and a scribe, concerning the first commandment in the law, 28—34. He demands of the scribes, whose Son th Messiah was to be, 35—37; warns the people against the ostentation and hypocrisy of the scribes, 38—40; and commends a poor widow, who had cast two mites into the treasury, 41—44.

AND [a]he began to speak unto them by parables. [b]A certain man [c]planted a vineyard, [d]and set an hedge about it, and digged a place for the wine-fat, and built a tower, [e]and let it out to husbandmen, [f]and went into a far country.

2 And [g]at the season he sent to the husbandmen [h]a servant, that he might receive from the husbandmen of the fruit of the vineyard.

3 And [i]they caught him, and beat him, [k]and sent him away empty.

4 And again he sent unto them another servant: and at him they cast stones, and wounded him in the head, and sent him away shamefully handled.

5 And again he sent another; [l]and him they killed, and many others; beating some, and killing some.

6 Having yet therefore [m]one son, [n]his well-beloved, he sent him also last unto them, saying, [o]They will reverence my son.

7 But those husbandmen said among themselves, [p]This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours.

8 And they took him, and killed him, and [q]cast him out of the vineyard.

9 What [r]shall therefore the lord of the vineyard do? [s]He will come and destroy the husbandmen, [t]and will give the vineyard unto others.

10 And [u]have ye not read this Scripture, [x]The Stone which the builders rejected is become the Head of the corner:

11 This [y]was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes?

12 And they sought to lay hold on him, but [z]feared the people; for they [a]knew that he had spoken the parable against them: and they left him, and went their way. [Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And [b]they sent unto him certain of the Pharisees, and of the [c]Herodians, to catch him in his words.

14 And when they were come, they say unto him, [d]Master, [e]we know that thou art true, and [f]carest for no man; [g]for thou regardest not the person of men, but teachest the way of God in truth: [h]Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?

15 Shall we give, or shall we not give? But he, [i]knowing their hypocrisy, said unto them, [k]Why tempt ye me? bring me [a]a penny, that I may see it.

16 And they brought it. And he saith unto them, Whose is this [l]image and superscription? And they said unto him, Cæsar's.

17 And Jesus answering said unto them, [m]Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, [n]and to God the things that are God's. [o]And they marvelled at him.

18 ¶ Then [p]come unto him the Sadducees, which [q]say there is no resurrection: and they asked him, saying,

19 Master, Moses wrote unto us, [r]If a man's brother die, and leave his wife behind him, and they cannot persist without the most fatal consequences: for, though they should for a time be successful, they must in the event be crushed by the power of the exalted Redeemer. (P. O. Matt. 21:12—16,33—46.)

V. 20—33. Alas! how many professed Christians and ministers are barren fig-trees, covered with leaves, raising, and disappointing, the expectations of those who seek fruit from them; and exposing themselves to the doom of being withered, and remaining to all eternity unfruitful under the awful curse of the Lord! We should fear this sentence far more than death, and should rest in no religion which does not render us "fruitful in good works." This will be the sure effect of "faith in God," in proportion as it is vigorous and lively. Thus our feeble attempts to do good may be rendered more successful than we could have imagined, by a divine blessing on our labours of love: and though we may not possess superior abilities, or station, influence, or authority; we may yet make a useful stand against the prevalence of impiety and iniquity, by the silent efficacy of fervent, constant prayers, whilst "we lift up holy hands, without wrath and doubting:" and, provided our petitions be dictated by a forgiving and loving spirit towards men, as well as by zeal for the honour of God, we may in this way, and by a Christian example and conversation, by "a word spoken in due season," and various other similar attempts, be useful; without any one having so much as a pretence for inquiring "by what authority we do such things." But should we be called out to more public services; while we act by the commission and according to the instructions of Christ, we need not greatly regard opposers, and shall not want a ready and pertinent answer to the inquiries of such as presume to interfere; though evidently ignorant of the most obvious and important distinction between those who act by authority from heaven, and those who are only sent forth by man. (P. O. Matt. 21: 17—32.)

V. 18—27. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 22:23—33. Luke 20:27—38.) The circumstances of the adduced case are more particularly related here than in Matthew: but the concluding words, "Ye therefore do greatly err," as a strong protest against the Sadducees, and their doctrine, is the most remarkable addition. leave no children, that his brother should take his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother.

20 Now [s]there were seven brethren: and the first took a wife, and dying left no seed.

21 And the second took her, and died, neither left he any seed: and the third likewise.

22 And the seven had her, and left no seed: last of all the woman died also.

23 In the resurrection therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them? for the seven had her to wife.

24 And Jesus answering said unto them, [t]Do ye not therefore err, [u]because ye know not the Scriptures, [x]neither the power of God?

25 For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry, nor are given in marriage: [y]but are as the angels which are in heaven.

26 And as touching the dead that they rise; [z]have ye not read [a]in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him, saying, [b]I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?

27 He [c]is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living; [d]ye therefore do greatly err.

28 ¶ And [e]one of the scribes came, and, having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that he had answered them well, asked him, [f]Which is the first commandment of all?

29 And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, [g]Hear, O Israel, The Lord our God is one Lord:

30 And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment.

31 And the second is like, namely this, [h]Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these.

32 And the scribe said unto him, Well, Master, thou hast said the truth: [i]for there is one God; and there is none other but He:

33 And to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love his neighbour as himself, [k]is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

34 And when Jesus saw that he answered discreetly, he said unto him, [l]Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. [m]And no man after that durst ask him any question. [Practical Observations.]

35 ¶ And Jesus answered and said, [n]while he taught in the temple, [o]How say the scribes that Christ is the Son of David?

36 For David himself said [p]by the Holy Ghost, [q]The LORD said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies thy footstool.

37 David therefore himself calleth him Lord; [r]and whence is he then his Son? [s]And the common people heard him gladly.

6:22,23. Heb. 11:13—16.) Where the narrative in Mark seems most entirely a repetition of that in Matthew; comparing them will fully show that Mark did not copy Matthew. —Indeed the difference of style in the Evangelists, is much more conspicuous in the original than in our translation, or probably in any translation.

V. 28—34. St. Matthew informs us, that this "scribe," "lawyer," or doctor of the law, was one of the company which convened together to consult in what manner they should proceed against Jesus; (Matt. 22:35.) and that he asked the question "tempting him:" yet he was convinced that Jesus had answered the Sadducees in a satisfactory manner. He was not exempt from the prejudices of the other scribes and Pharisees: but it is evident that he had far deeper convictions and juster apprehensions about religion than the rest of them. To prove Jesus still further, how far he was able to resolve difficult questions, and perhaps with some expectation of entangling him in his discourse, he asked him, "which was the first," or greatest "commandment in the whole law." The Pharisees, scribes, and teachers of the Jews had several frivolous disputes on this subject, suited to their traditions and superstitious observances grounded on them. Our Lord, however, took no notice of these controversies, but returned a direct answer to the question: referring the scribe to the summary of the first table of the law, which Moses had given them, and which has already been fully explained. (Notes, Deut. 6:4,5.) This he declared to be the "first commandment;" as it is of the highest possible importance and obligation, and as it virtually implies in it all other commandments. He then added, that the rule of loving our neighbours as ourselves was the second in importance, and of a similar nature: this too has been explained. (Note, Lev. 19:18.) He then declared, that there was no other commandment greater than these; as on them depended all the law and the prophets. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, Matt. 22:34—40, vv. 37,39,40. Luke 10:25—29. Rom. 13:8—10.) When these two precepts are properly explained and understood, they are found to contain the substance of all which was commanded in the law, or enforced by the prophets: unless these be properly received and observed, nothing else in religion is of any value; in proportion as they are understood, all other parts of Scripture are unfolded in their nature, use, and importance; and whilst the types, predictions, and promises of Christ and the gospel are illustrated, the pardoned and justified believer, loving and obeying these commandments unreservedly, though not perfectly, cannot but attend to every other part of his duty to God and man. (Notes, Ex. 20:1—17. John 1:17. Rom. 3:19,20,29—31, v. 31. 7:9—12. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 19.)—This answer of Christ was so satisfactory and convincing, that the scribe openly declared he had spoken the truth in a most excellent manner; and that all sacrifices, however numerous and costly, were comparatively of small value. These were typical atonements for transgressions of the moral law; and were of no efficacy, except as they were the expression of repentance, and of faith in the promised Saviour, and as they led to moral obedience. When Jesus, therefore, heard the scribe answer so discreetly and pertinently, and like a man who understood the nature of true religion, and the spirituality and excellency of the moral law; he declared that "he was not far from the kingdom of God." Probably this man afterwards became a disciple of our Lord. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Deut. 6:4. 1 Sam. 15:22. Ps. 50:7—15. Is. 1:10—20. Jer. 7:21—23. Hos. 5:6. Am. 5:21—24. Mic. 6:6—8.)—The quotation of the first and great commandment, here made, is not exactly either from the Hebrew, or the Septuagint; but contains the evident meaning of the passage. The clause "with all thy mind," or "with all the understanding," is additional; and shows that in general all the capacities of the rational soul are intended.

41 ¶ And Jesus [b]sat over against the treasury, and beheld how the people cast [c]money into the treasury: and many that were rich cast in much.

42 And there came a certain poor widow; and she threw in two mites, which make a farthing.

43 And he called unto him his disciples, and saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, [c]That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury:

44 For all they did [d]cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even [e]all her living.

V. 41—44. (Note, Luke 21:1—4.) Our Lord, being about finally to leave the temple, sat down over against the treasury, into which the people put money to defray the several expenses incurred by the stated services of the sanctuary. While he there beheld the Jews making their oblations, he observed several rich persons contributing large sums: but at length a poor widow put in two mites; the exact amount of which is not easily determined, but it could not be less than a farthing, nor so much as a penny, of our money. Upon this, Jesus declared that she had cast in more than all the rest: for the large donations of the rich were only a part of their superfluities, and bore a small proportion to the abundance which still remained for their own expenses and indulgence at present, and in reserve for the future, to them and their heirs: but she had in reality cast in "all her living;" having nothing left to buy food for herself, save what she might afterwards earn by labour, or procure in some other precarious manner. Doubtless our Lord saw her heart humble and upright, devoted to God, and desirous to express her affection to his worship; and that she did not cast in her pittance out of affectation of singularity, or expectation of being applauded for it, but in dependence on the promises and providence of God, and out of love to his name. Others, in such circumstances, would have pleaded that so small a sum would be of no use, and that they could not spare it; nay, many would have derided this poor widow, or dissuaded her from making any oblation: but our Lord approved and commended her conduct; thus teaching us many important lessons, to direct and encourage us in our several duties.—How applicable it is to the case of weekly small subscriptions from the poor to Bible societies, and Missionary societies, must be obvious to every reflecting reader. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. We are accountable to God for all those peculiar advantages, which are afforded us, in order that we may become fruitful in good works. Our gracious Lord, the Proprietor of the vineyard, waits for the fruits till "the due season;" but he will by no means dispense with any who do not render them: and as we in this land are even more favoured than the Jews of old, so our doom will be more dreadful if we continue unfruitful. The sacred Scriptures in our hands, or in our houses, and the labours of faithful preachers, are so many demands on us, to render the due revenue of glory to God, by the holiness of our lives: and the coming of the beloved Son of the Father, and all his miracles, doctrines, and salvation, were intended to supply us with motives, encouragements, and assistance for fruitfulness. But proud and carnal men, though they profess themselves the worshippers of God, will be exceedingly offended at these truths and warnings: and many rulers and teachers, to whom the vineyard has especially been entrusted, have often been and still are ready to insult, beat, and murder the servants of God, who came to demand the fruits in their Master's name; nay, they have not shown reverence even to his Son, but have acted with decided contempt and enmity against him, for the sake of their own credit, authority, and secular interest! Thus have "the builders rejected the Corner-stone" of the temple to their own ruin; and in securing their present advantages, have come short of "the inheritance of the saints in light," and sunk into the most tremendous state of misery and despair. Let sinners beware of this proud or worldly spirit: and remember, that if they are offended by the faithful reproofs and admonitions of zealous ministers, they would have been far more irritated by those of Jesus Christ, had they lived when he was on earth; and would, therefore, have concurred with his crucifiers. If provoked to revile or ridicule their teachers, instead of profiting by their labours, they would easily be tempted to ill treat or murder them, were the power in their hands: for when this disposition prevails, the more plain and convincing the truth is rendered, the greater rage and enmity it excites. Let us then regard and profit by the instructions of the servants, as a proof that we really "reverence the beloved Son" of our glorious God: and let us seek grace from him that we "may be filled with all the fruits of righteousness which are through Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God," that our privileges may be continued to us, and that our souls may be perfected, when wicked professors of Christianity shall be expelled and destroyed for ever. (P. O. Matt. 21:33—46. 23:34—39. Luke 20:1—18.)

V. 13—27. Wisdom, truth, and holiness must excite opposition in this wicked world: for they are equally contrary to open impiety or infidelity, and to hypocrisy, and the love of secular interest and preferment; and thus naturally excite, as it were, an effervescence, whenever they meet with them. But, while men of different, and even opposite sentiments or parties seek to entangle ministers in their words, let these imitate the firmness, meekness, and prudence of the Lord Jesus; and endeavour to graft important instruction on insidious questions, and on frivolous or malignant objections. If all professed Christians did indeed conscientiously "render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's," according to the exhortations of every faithful and wise teacher; and if all who preach the gospel, approved themselves true men, no "respecters of persons, but teachers of the way of God in truth," they would soon put to shame and silence the ignorant cavils of obstinate adversaries. For though truth and holiness are the real objects of their implacable enmity, our errors and misconduct give them their most plausible handle against us. We should then study to "walk with wisdom towards them that are without;" as well as to avoid hypocrisy, which is always known to our heart-searching Judge. Thus we may pass through this dying world, with a joyful hope of immortal happiness, and of a glorious resurrection: and may expect to be at length made "equal to the angels;" while Sadducees can only expect at best, to live and die like "the beasts that perish." We should then diligently seek to understand, accurately and fully, the sacred Scriptures, and endeavour to enlarge our apprehensions of "the power of God;" that we may be preserved from fatal errors, and have confidence in "the God of Abraham," and of all believers, as our everlasting Portion and Felicity; that we may "know how to answer every man" in a conclusive manner, and to avoid all useless altercations, as well as to confute all vain objections. (P. O. Matt. 22:15—33. Luke 20:19—47.)

V. 28—34. By pertinent replies to one description of opposers, we may sometimes obtain a more candid hearing from others, who have hitherto been equally estranged from the truth: for we shall find some more teachable than the rest, of those collective bodies to which they belong. A careful attention to the Scriptures will also convince us of the very great importance of a deep acquaintance with the spirituality, extent, reasonableness, and excellency of the moral law. Whilst, therefore, many are disputing about nice distinctions in speculative points, or external ceremonies and observances; we should peculiarly hearken to the sacred word, which requires us to "love the LORD our God with all our heart, our soul, and mind, and strength," and "to love our neighbours as ourselves." Did we thus love the Lord with all our powers and faculties, and to the full extent of them: did we thus supremely admire and delight in his infinite excellencies; did we wholly desire his favour and love, as our felicity; were we thus filled with adoring gratitude for his unspeakable goodness to us; and were we completely actuated by zeal for his glory, as in reason and justice we ought to be: what spiritual worshippers and devoted servants of God should we be! and in what should we differ from the inhabitants of heaven? (Note, Ex. 20:2.) Did we "love our neighbours as ourselves," and in every thing seek their good, and value their comfort and happiness equally with our own; what perfect justice, truth, purity, goodness, compassion, and peace would every where prevail! (Notes, and P. O. Luke 10:25—37.) This indeed would be far "more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices." But, because we have not thus loved God and man; because our character and conduct have been, and are, (as far as left to ourselves,) the reverse of this blessed temper and behaviour; therefore we are condemned sinners, we need repentance, we need mercy, and the Saviour's righteousness

CHAPTER XIII.

Christ predicts the destruction of the temple and of Jerusalem, 1, 2; and shows what signs and calamities should go before that catastrophe, 3–23, and what should happen at the time of his coming, 24–27. The parable of a fig-tree, showing the near and certain approach of these events, 28–31. No man knows the day or hour; therefore all ought to watch and pray, and be ready, 32–37.

AND [a]as he went [b]out of the temple, one of his disciples saith unto him, Master, see what manner of stones, and what buildings are here!

2 And Jesus answering said unto him, Seest thou these great buildings? [c]there shall not be left one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down.

3 And [d]as he sat upon the mount of Olives, over against the temple, [e]Peter, and James, and John, and Andrew, asked him [f]privately,

4 Tell us, [g]when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when all these things shall be fulfilled.

5 And Jesus answering them, began to say, [h]Take heed lest any man deceive you:

6 For [i]many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; [k]and shall deceive many.

7 And [l]when ye shall hear of wars, and rumours of wars, be ye not troubled: for such things [m]must needs be; but the end shall not be yet.

8 For [n]nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be [o]earthquakes in divers places, and there shall be [o]famines and troubles: [p]these are the beginnings of [q]sorrows.

9 But [r]take heed to yourselves: for [s]they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten: and ye shall be brought before rulers and kings for my sake, [t]for a testimony against them.

10 And [u]the gospel must first be published among all nations.

11 But when they shall lead you, [v]and deliver you up, [w]take no thought beforehand what ye shall speak, neither do ye premeditate; but whatsoever [x]shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, [y]but the Holy Ghost.

12 Now [z]the brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son; and children shall rise up against their parents, and shall cause them to be put to death.

13 And [a]ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: [b]but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.

and atoning sacrifice; we cannot be justified by the works of the law, but must be "saved by grace, through faith," and "by the sanctification of his Spirit unto obedience." Yet, if really interested in this redemption, we shall love and obey these great commandments, as our perfect rule of duty; and daily mourn and be humbled, because our obedience to them is so very defective. Thus a just apprehension of the holy law is generally the first step towards a spiritual understanding of the gospel, and a proper improvement of its glorious truths: and though many, who contend for the doctrines of free salvation, might have been ready to reprobate the conviction and confession of the scribe, as self-righteous; we may easily perceive, that our Lord, with perfect wisdom and propriety, allowed him to have "answered discreetly," and as a man of reflection and intelligence; and declared that he was "not far from the kingdom of God." We may also learn from our Lord's example to commend what is right, and to encourage what is hopeful, in those who differ from us, and are even prejudiced against us.

V. 35—44. With a proper view of the holy law, a serious recollection of its awful sanction, and a believing prospect of the day of judgment, we shall be prepared to attend reverently to what the Scriptures declare, concerning the person and offices of Christ; and shall be led more unreservedly to confess him to be "our Lord and our God;" to welcome him as "the End of the law for righteousness to every one who believeth;" (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.) to obey him as our exalted Redeemer; and to rejoice, that he is seated at the right hand of the Father, to perfect his people's salvation, and to "put all enemies under his feet."—If "the common people hear these things gladly," while the learned and distinguished in rank and authority oppose them; we may congratulate the former, however despised and neglected, and pity the latter, in the midst of their renown and splendour: for what will rich or long clothing, salutations in public assemblies, or "chief rooms in synagogues" and feasts, however now loved and valued, avail men; when the Judge shall prove their devotions to have been the mask of impiety and iniquity, and sentence them to receive the deeper condemnation?—And let us not forget, that Jesus still watches the treasury, to observe how much and from what motives, men contribute to it. He approves of liberality in the rich; and they ought to appropriate a far greater proportion of their wealth to works of piety and charity, than they generally do, or indeed almost ever do; but it should be in simplicity, and not from pride and ostentation. And though their contributions should be encouraged; they ought not to be flattered into an opinion, that they are meritorious, or that they can atone for their ungodliness or licentiousness, and prove a substitute for repentance, faith, and holiness. Nor should the poor on any account be discouraged or despised in their humble endeavours to show "the sincerity of their love;" as their small oblations, spared from their hard-earned and scanty supply, and from such expenses as are generally deemed needful, are more honourable to God, more evident effects of the power of divine grace, and expressions of patient self-denial and reliance on Providence; as well as, by comparison, a far greater bounty, than the applauded generosity of their superiors. Let then the poor contribute their mite to the relief of the distressed, or to promote the cause of God: and though men may deride or censure them, and those who excite and encourage them to such contributions; the Lord will approve and graciously recompense them. They will not be impoverished by what they lend in this manner to him; and their believing and thankful, though feeble efforts to honour him, and to do good to their brethren, will be mentioned with commendation in that day, when all the splendid actions of unbelievers will be exposed to deserved contempt, as the result of pride, ostentation, enmity to God, and dislike to his holy and humbling salvation. (P. O. Matt. 22:34—46. 25:34—36.)

'Our Saviour seems to hold out the destruction of Jerusalem, which is his principal subject, as a type of the dissolution of the world. ... By thus judiciously mingling together these two important catastrophes, he gives at the same time (as he does in many other instances) a most interesting admonition to his immediate hearers, the Jews, and a most awful lesson to all his future disciples: and the benefit of his predictions, instead of being confined to one occasion, or one people, is, by this admirable management, extended to every subsequent period of time, and to the whole Christian world.' *Bp. The Son, &c.] The precise season, either of the day of judgment, or of the destruction of Jerusalem, was no part of the revelation which the incarnate Son of God had received to communicate to his church: it was not revealed to his human nature, by the unction of the Holy Spirit. But we cannot understand many things, which relate to the mysterious union of his divine and human nature, and should not further presume to pry into them.—' "The Son" is here considered as the Prophet sent into the world, to reveal the Father's will: and therefore as delivering to the world, not what the Logos knew or taught, but what the Spirit of God revealed to him. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23. When we behold the magnificence of flourishing cities, and stately palaces or temples, we should recollect how soon they will all be desolated and come to nothing, through the sin of man; that we may be reminded, how necessary it is for us to have a more permanent mansion in heaven, and to be prepared for it by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit, sought in the earnest and persevering use of all 'the means of grace.'—If we duly consider how soon all temporal things will pass away, like an empty vision, we shall find our desires after wealth, grandeur, and prosperity abated: and we shall be less disquieted, on our own account, when we hear of wars, earthquakes, famines, and other dreadful judgments; however we may be concerned for the sufferers, and sympathize with them. Such reflections will conduce to reconcile us to the thoughts of contempt, reproach, and persecution: but they will render us also more careful, that "no man may deceive us," or draw us into error, to prevent our being "partakers of Christ," and the blessings of the gospel. Indeed we cannot profess and adorn his holy doctrine, without experiencing many effects of the world's hatred and scorn: but, if we be wearied by our trivial difficulties, what should we be, if we were delivered up to councils and rulers, and treated by them with rage and cruelty; or if betrayed by near relations, and exposed to the sentence of death for our adherence to the truth? (Note, Jer. 12:5,6.)—When the hatred of men, and the fear of hardship and suffering, cause us to shrink or complain, we should remember, that "he that continueth unto the end, the same shall be saved;" but "if any man draw back, the Lord will have no pleasure in him." We should take comfort under our trials for the sake of Jesus, by hoping that our testimony to his truth, and our patience and meekness under the cross, may be of use, even to our persecutors or revilers; and assuredly our "light afflictions, and

The chief priests and scribes conspire to put Jesus to death, 1, 2. A woman pours precious ointment on his head; with the circumstances attending her conduct, 3—9. Judas bargains with the chief priests to betray him, 10, 11. The disciples by the direction of Jesus prepare the passover, 12—16. He eats it with them, and points out the traitor, 17—21. He institutes the Lord's supper, 22—25. He foretells, that all the disciples would forsake him, and that Peter would deny him, 26—31. His agony and prayer in the garden, and his warnings to the disciples, 32—42. He is betrayed, apprehended, and forsaken, 43—52. He is arraigned before Caiaphas, condemned, and treated with cruel indignity, 53—65. Peter thrice denies him, but repents, 66—72.

AFTER [a]two days was the feast of [b]the passover, and of unleavened bread: [c]and the chief priests and the scribes sought how they might take him [d]by craft, and put him to death.

2 But they said, [e]Not on the feast-day, [f]lest there be an uproar of the people.

3 ¶ And [g]being in Bethany, in the house of Simon the leper, as he sat at meat, there came a woman, having an alabaster-box [h]of ointment of [i]spikenard, very precious; and she brake the box, and poured it on his head.

4 And [j]there were some that had indignation within themselves, and said, [k]Why was this waste of the ointment made?

5 For it might have been sold for more than three hundred [l]pence, and [l]have been given to the poor. [m]And they murmured against her.

6 And Jesus said, [n]Let her alone; why trouble ye her? she hath wrought [o]a good work on me.

7 For [p]ye have the poor with you always, and whensoever ye will ye may do them good: [q]but me ye have not always.

8 She [r]hath done what she could: [s]she is come aforehand to anoint my body to the burying.

9 Verily I say unto you, [t]Wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of, for [u]a memorial of her.

10 ¶ And [x]Judas Iscariot, [y]one of the twelve, went unto the chief priests, to betray him unto them.

but for a moment, will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Should any of us be called to appear before the princes of this world in so good a cause; we ought not to be anxious about "what we should speak," or to "premeditate," in a distrustful and disquieting manner: for, in such extraordinary cases, we may expect peculiar assistance, and that the Spirit of God will teach us to plead the cause of his truth with propriety and energy.—The enmity and pride of man's heart, when inflamed by religious bigotry and furious zeal, produce most fatal effects: this should put us upon our guard, and instruct us to pray for the Spirit of wisdom, truth, and love, to dwell in our hearts, and to counteract and mortify our natural depraved propensities, even in our religious pursuits and controversies.—Indeed, when we consider, that brethren, and even parents and children, are capable of hating, betraying, and murdering each other; and that atrocious abominations are often established even in the very sanctuary: (Notes and P. O. Ez. 8.) we shall see more abundant cause to flee without delay for refuge to Christ, from our own sins, and those of others; and to renounce every earthly object to secure the salvation of our souls. We should also deem every thing an evil, and pray against it as such, which tends to retard our course to heaven: for every unbeliever will soon be overtaken with such misery, as has never been witnessed on earth "from the beginning of the creation that God created, unto this time, neither shall be." (P. O. Matt. 24:1—28. Luke 21:1—19.)

V. 24—37. In all things we ought to remember the Saviour's words: for as sure as the predictions, which related to Jerusalem and the temple, were exactly accomplished; so will all those things come to pass, which are written concerning the eternal happiness of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked in another world. Ere long "heaven and earth shall pass away," and all the things which we behold will be dissolved; but "the words of Christ shall not pass away." A firm belief of his truth will be our only and our effectual preservative against those seducers, and our sure support under those trials, which occasion the ruin of all, "but the elect, whom God hath chosen." At length we shall see "the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory," and then all his chosen people will be gathered from among the wicked into his heavenly kingdom. Instead, therefore, of curiously inquiring into "the secret things, which belong to the LORD;" let us carefully improve the revelation of his will, by "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure." (Notes, 2 Pet. 1:5—11.) We know that the hour of our death cannot be very distant: our Lord, though not present to our sight, beholds our whole conduct, and will shortly come to call us to an account for it. To some of his professed servants he entrusts authority to preach his gospel, to preside in his church, and to be his porters for the admission of proper persons into sacred services and ordinances, and to exclude such as are unfit for them; and to every one of us he gives his proper work, by attending to which we may approve ourselves true believers, and both honour our Lord and serve our generation. (Note, Phil. 1:9—11.) Happy therefore is that servant, who continues sober, vigilant, and diligent in his place, without interfering with that of other men! He will be prepared for the coming of his Lord, whenever that may be: he will be found awake and employed in his service, according to the duty of his station; and his gracious recompense will be secure. But it will be an awful surprise to a professed Christian or minister, should he be found sleeping, supine, self-indulgent, and unprepared, by his Lord at his coming; yet this may probably be our case, if at any time we relax our vigilance, or neglect our work. (Note, Heb. 4:1,2.) He therefore speaks to us and to all, charging and warning us to "take heed to ourselves," to our duty, or our ministry, and to watch and pray always, "lest coming suddenly he should find us sleeping." (P. O. Matt. 24:29—51. Luke 21:20—38.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1, 2. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 26:1—5. John 11:49—57.

V. 3—9. (Notes, Matt. 26:6—13. Luke 7:37—39. John 12:1—8.) 'It appears to me more probable that Matthew and Mark should have introduced this story a little out of its place; that Lazarus, if he made this feast, (which is not expressly said by John,) should have made use of Simon's house, as more convenient; and that Mary should have poured this ointment on Christ's head and body, as well as on his feet; than that, within the compass of four days, Christ should have been twice anointed with so costly a perfume; and that the same fault should be found with the action, and the same value set on the ointment, and the same words used in defence of the woman, and all this in the presence of many of the same persons: all which improbable particulars must be admitted, if the stories be considered as different.' Doddridge.—Neither Matthew nor Mark says, that this occurred no more than two days before the passover; they only relate it subsequent to some transactions which took place at that time. It happened when Jesus was at Bethany: this may be explained to mean any evening from his arrival on this occasion at Bethany, till the passover; and it was no doubt on the first evening, before he entered Jerusalem riding on the ass's colt.

Sold. (5) Mary had not bought it on this occasion: but she might have sold it; as perhaps she had done many of those ornaments and luxuries, which she had used before she "chose the good part." (Tables.) A denarius was then a day's wages of a labourer even in harvest (Matt. 20:2.) and therefore equal in value, though not in weight, to three shillings at least in this land at present; as it would purchase as many necessaries of life.—This would therefore appear a large sum. The language concerning the poor (7), "Whensoever ye will ye may do them good," and so show your love and gratitude to me, should be especially noticed.—Mary "did what she could," (8) to express her reverence, love, and gratitude to Jesus; whom she regarded as her Lord and her Saviour, and to whom she considered herself as under the greatest possible obligations. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:1—20. 2 Cor. 9:12—15.) But this is totally different from the pretensions of many, 'that they do what they can;' that is, "to establish their own righteousness," while they refuse to "submit to the righteousness of God." 11 And when they heard it, [s]they were glad, [t]and promised to give him money. And [u]he sought how he might conveniently betray him.

12 ¶ And [v]the first day of unleavened bread, when they [w]killed the passover, his disciples said to him, [x]Where wilt thou that we go and prepare, that thou mayest eat the passover?

13 And he sendeth forth two of his disciples, and saith unto them, [c]Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him.

14 And wheresoever he shall go in, say ye to the good man of the house, [z]The Master saith, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?

15 And [a]he will show you a large [b]upper room furnished and prepared: there make ready for us.

16 And his disciples went forth, and came into the city, [c]and found as he had said unto them: and they made ready the passover. [Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ And [d]in the evening he cometh with the twelve.

18 And [e]as they sat and did eat, Jesus said, [m]Verily I say unto you, [n]One of you which eateth with me shall betray me.

19 And they began to be sorrowful, [o]and to say unto him one by one, Is it I? and another said, Is it I?

20 And he answered and said unto them, [p]It is one of the twelve that [q]dippeth with me in the dish.

21 The Son of man indeed [r]goeth, as it is written of him: [s]but wo to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! [t]good were it for that man if he had never been born.

22 ¶ And [u]as they did eat, Jesus took bread, [x]and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat: [y]this is my body.

23 And he took the cup, and [z]when he had given thanks, he gave it to them: [a]and they all drank of it.

24 And he said unto them, [b]This is my blood of the new testament, [c]which is shed for many.

25 Verily I say unto you, [d]I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it [e]new in the kingdom of God.

26 ¶ And when they had [f]sung an [1]hymn, [g]they went out into the mount of Olives.

27 And Jesus saith unto them, [h]All ye shall be offended because of me this night: [i]for it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered.

28 But [k]after that I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee.

29 But Peter said unto him, [l]Although all shall be offended, yet will not I.

30 And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, That [m]this day, even in this night, [n]before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.

31 But [o]he spake the more vehemently, If I should die with thee, I will not deny thee in any wise. [p]Likewise also said they all.

32 ¶ And [q]they came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and he saith to his disciples, Sit ye here, [r]while I shall pray.

33 And he taketh with him [s]Peter, and James, and John, [t]and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy;

34 And saith unto them, [u]My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, [z]and watch.

35 And he went forward a little, [y]and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from him.

36 And he said, [z]Abba, Father, [a]all things are possible unto thee; [b]take away this cup from me: [c]nevertheless, not what I will, but what thou wilt.

37 And he cometh, [d]and findeth them sleeping,

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 26:14—16. Luke 22:1—13, vv. 3—6. John 13:1—5.) It is not certain, on which day Judas first went to the chief priests; but it is most probable, that it was two days before the passover, when they were consulting how to apprehend Jesus, that they might put him to death. The devil had before this "put it into his heart;" but it may be supposed that he hesitated for a time, before he carried his design into execution.

V. 12—16. (Note, Matt. 26:17—19.) Nothing could be less the object of natural sagacity and foresight, than the events here mentioned. Had the two disciples come to the place specified, rather sooner or latter than they did, the "man, bearing the pitcher of water," would either not have arrived, or he would have been gone. But our Lord knew that the owner of a certain commodious house in Jerusalem favoured him; he foresaw that at a precise time of the day, he would send his servant for a pitcher of water; that the disciples would meet him just when they entered the city; that by following him they would find out the person whom he intended; and that by mentioning him, as "the Master," or "the Teacher," the owner of the house would readily consent to accommodate them in an upper chamber. When the disciples found all these circumstances so exactly accord to the prediction, they could not but be deeply impressed with a conviction of their Lord's knowledge of every event, and his influence over every heart. He spake the more vehemently. (31) Εκ περισσου ελεγε μαλλον. I know no English words which can fully express the emphasis of the original.—The circumstances of Peter's self-confidence, and dreadful fall, are related with peculiar energy by St. Mark, who is supposed to have written his gospel under Peter's immediate inspection; but those of his repentance are more slightly touched on. (Note, 66—72.)

V. 32—36. Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 26:36—39. Luke 22:39—46.—And he said, &c. (36) 'O Father, I know that all things are possible to thine ... Almighty power. and saith unto Peter, [e]Simon, sleepest thou? [f]couldest not thou watch one hour?

38 [g]Watch ye, and pray, lest ye enter into temptation: [h]the spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak.

39 And again [i]he went away, and prayed, and spak the same words.

40 And when he returned, he found them asleep again; (for their eyes were heavy;) [k]neither wist they what to answer him.

41 And he cometh the third time, and saith unto them, [l]Sleep on now, and take your rest: it is enough, [m]the hour is come; behold, [n]the Son of man is betrayed into the hand of sinners.

42 Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand. [Practical Observations.]

43 ¶ And immediately, [o]while he yet spake, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, [p]and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders.

44 And he that betrayed him had given them [q]a token, saying, [r]Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he; take him, [s]and lead him away safely.

45 And as soon as he was come, he goeth straightway to him, and saith, [t]Master, Master; and kissed him.

46 And [u]they laid their hands on him, and took him.

47 And [x]one of them that stood by drew a sword, and smote a servant of the high-priest, and cut off his ear.

48 And Jesus answered and said unto them, [y]Are ye come out as against a thief, with swords and with staves to take me?

49 I [z]was daily with you in the temple teaching, and ye took me not: [a]but the Scriptures must be fulfilled.

50 And [b]they all forsook him, and fled.

51 And there followed him a certain young man, having a linen cloth cast about his naked body; and the young men laid hold on him.

52 And [c]he left the linen cloth, and fled from them naked.

53 ¶ And [d]they led Jesus away to the high-priest: [e]and with him were assembled all the chief priests, and the elders, and the scribes.

54 And [f]Peter followed him afar off, [g]even into the palace of the high-priest: [h]and he sat with the servants, [i]and warmed himself at the fire.

55 And the chief priests and all the council [k]sought for witness against Jesus to put him to death; [l]and found none:

56 For many bare false witness against him; but their witness agreed not together.

57 And there arose certain, [m]and bare false witness against him, saying, 58 We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another [n]made without hands.

59 But [o]neither so did their witness agree together.

60 And the high-priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, [p]Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee?

61 But [q]he held his peace, and answered nothing. Again the high-priest asked him, and said unto him, [r]Art thou the Christ, [s]the Son of the Blessed?

62 And Jesus said, [t]I am: and ye shall see [u]the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

63 Then the high-priest rent [x]his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses?

64 Ye [y]have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? And they all condemned him to be guilty of death.

65 And [z]some began to spit on him, and to cover his face, and to buffet him, and to say unto him, Prophesy: and the servants did strike him with the palms of their hands.

66 ¶ And [a]as Peter was beneath in the palace, there cometh [b]one of the maids of the high-priest:

67 And when she saw Peter warming himself,

V. 51, 52. It is probable, though not certain, that this young man was one of our Lord's followers: being, however, awaked by the tumult, he seems to have left his bed, covered only with a sheet, or loose covering; and to have followed the company, either out of curiosity, or from affection to Jesus. He was, on this account at least, suspected to be a disciple; and "the young men," the soldiers, or servants, attempted to lay hold on him; so that he was forced to flee away naked, and escape for his life. (Marg. Ref. c.) But, though the transaction was conducted with such extreme violence, the apostles had been permitted to escape through the secret influence of Jesus over the minds of those who apprehended him! PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. While numbers combine with implacable enmity against Christ, and employ both power and subtlety to run down his truth, and injure his people; there are a few, though generally in inferior stations, who spare no pains or expense to express their love to him, and to promote his glory. But it is not uncommon for their fervent expressions of zeal and affection to be misunderstood, and censured, even by their brethren, as well as by hypocrites and open enemies. We should not therefore be discouraged, if those whom we love should think our time, labour, or expense wasted, or misapplied; when we are sincerely desirous of honouring Christ and promoting his gospel, and are really employed in some good work for him: and, on the other hand, we should fear giving any molestation to those, who are led to express their love in a different manner than we do.—Happy is he, of whom in these things the Lord says, "He did what he could."—We indeed have not Christ personally present with us, and may have little opportunity of promoting his cause, or ability to do it; but we have "the poor always with us, and whensoever we will we may do them good:" and if in this, or in any other proper way, we "show the sincerity of our love" and gratitude to our gracious Redeemer, he will accept our well-meant services, and make them known to the whole world, for a memorial of us; when mercenary hypocrites, as well as avowed enemies, shall sink into shame and everlasting contempt. (Notes, Matt. 25:34—40. P. O. 31—40. 26:1—13. John 12:1—8. Notes, 2 Cor. 8:1—9.)—Our blessed Lord knows every circumstance respecting us before it comes to pass: and if we carefully compare our experience with his words, we shall be more and more convinced, that he is ordering every thing relative to us, in perfect wisdom, truth, and goodness, "according to the counsel of his own will;" and that even the most painful dispensations will in the event conduce to the good of all who trust in him.—Whatever we possess is then best employed, and most profitable to us, when it is most entirely devoted to the Redeemer's service: if we be disposed to admit him, he will come and dwell in our hearts, and will provide for us that we may feast with him: and when we consecrate our houses to him, by family-worship properly conducted, and by hospitably entertaining his disciples, he will there also manifest his presence with us and bless us. (P. O. Matt. 26:14—25.)

V. 17—42. While we consider the Lord Jesus, ('the very paschal Lamb, that was sacrificed for us;' and who has given his body to be broken, and his blood to be shed, that we might live by faith in his name,) as attending on those divine institutions which bring sin to remembrance; that he might "fulfil all righteousness:" let us learn, in copying his example, to beware of hypocrisy, and to fear being counted intruders, or detected as traitors. To be preserved from this, we must "take heed and beware of covetousness," and be diligent in self-examination: not trusting to our own hearts, but still inquiring, when we read of the guilt and misery of hypocrites and apostates, "Lord, is it I?" as more ready to suspect ourselves than any of our brethren. Let us thus "examine ourselves," and then, as frequently as opportunity is afforded us, "let us eat of that bread, and drink of that cup," which are the appointed symbols of the body and blood of Christ, given for us, to purchase the blessings of the new covenant for our perishing souls. Thus we shall be frequently led to recollect our guilt and danger, our hope and our obligations, and our profession of faith, and love to our Redeemer and his ransomed flock: thus we shall receive renewed pledges of his love to us, and have our affections enlivened, and our strength increased, for his service: thus we shall anticipate the blessed hour, when we shall drink of the fruit of our living Vine with him, for ever new in the kingdom of our Father: and thus we shall also be prepared for bearing our cross, for drinking of the cup of tribulation, and for tasting death in our passage to glory. (P. O. Matt. 26:26—35.)—The great and good Shepherd indeed passed through his unspeakable sufferings, without one false step; but even the principal of his followers have often been offended and scattered by the comparatively small measure of afflictions allotted to them: and this has been exactly proportioned to the degree, in which they have confided in themselves, and formed their resolutions in their own strength.—Did we indeed properly contemplate the scene exhibited in Gethsemane; did we duly consider the amazement and anguish of the great Redeemer, when "his soul was sorrowful even unto death," through the load of our guilt which he willingly sustained; did we advert to "his strong crying and tears," (Note, Heb. 5:7—10, v. 7.) and to the victorious resignation of his heart, when he said, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt:" these reflections would fill our minds with such convictions concerning the evil of sin, the awful justice of God, the love of the Saviour, the vanity of the world, the impotency of men's malice, and the danger and helpless condition of our souls; as would have a powerful effect, in rendering us humble, dependent, thankful, and steadfast, in the hour of trial; and in exciting us to watchfulness and prayer, lest we should be borne down by the force of temptation, or lest we should at last fall under the insupportable wrath of God. But, alas! while unbelievers entirely disregard this interesting and affecting subject, even believers are apt to contemplate it in a drowsy manner; and, instead of being "ready to die with Christ," they are often unprepared to "watch with him one hour!" Thus, after repeated warnings, through their own negligence they "enter into temptation;" and then, through the weakness of the flesh, they fall into sin, notwithstanding the readiness of the spirit in their better moments. (Notes, Rom. 7:15—21. P. O. 15—25.) But let us not attempt to excuse such folly, disobedience, and ingratitude; should Jesus call us to account for it, we should not know what to answer him: and though he will not cast off the true believer for these offences, he will yet sharply rebuke and chasten him, and bring him to condemn himself on account of them. (P. O. Matt. 26:36—46. Luke 22:35—46.)

V. 43—72. There is an essential difference between the general character of faulty disciples, and that of hypocrites. These often prove traitors, and deliberately join the enemies of Christ in opposing his cause. Having long carried on a trade of iniquity, under the mask of piety, and amid all the means of grace, the grow callous in sin, and treat all religious concerns with an unfeeling familiarity; they conceal their crimes, by attending on ordinances and sacraments; and, whilst they presumptuously call Christ their Lord and Master, and express great affection for him, they betray him into the hands of his implacable enemies. Thus they hasten their own destruction, and "it would have been better for them had they never been born."—Whilst the enemies of Christ are actuated by the most outrageous malice, and seem to carry every thing their own way, they are under secret restraints, and can only fulfil the Scriptures: nor can they move any faster or further, or touch one person more, than the Lord is pleased to permit them. (Note, Ps. 76:10.)—The most enormous wickedness has commonly been committed under the forms of law and justice, and varnished over by a semblance of piety: and while rulers have been ringleaders in the most aggravated perjury, venality, oppression, and murder; they have often paused, and perplexed themselves, in devising how to regulate their conduct by statute and custom, and with the appearance of impartiality! Indeed, when we contemplate the whole body of the rulers and teachers of God's professed people, combined against his holy and beloved Son, and determined at any rate to condemn him to death; and when we view him given up by them as a malefactor, to such insults and cruelties as the vilest murderer would have been exempted from; we have the clearest demonstration of man's extreme enmity to God, and of God's most free and unspeakable love to man. In the conduct of our suffering Lord, we see the brightest

CHAPTER XV.

Jesus is bound, and delivered up unto Pilate; and when accused before him, and interrogated by him, he continues silent, 1—5. Pilate, induced by the priests and people, releases Barabbas, and delivers Jesus to be crucified, 6—15. The soldiers crown him with thorns, and cruelly mock him; and then lead him away to the place of crucifixion, 16—24. He is crucified between two thieves, and reviled by the people and the priests, 25—32. The sun is darkened; and Jesus, calling on God, expires, 33—37. The veil of the temple is rent; and the centurion confesses him to be "the Son of God," 38, 39. Certain women are spectators of his crucifixion, 40, 41. Joseph of Arimathea asks Pilate for the body, which having obtained he honourably inters, 42—47.

AND [a]straightway in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council, and bound Jesus, and carried him away, [b]and delivered him to Pilate.

2 And Pilate asked him, [c]Art thou the King of the Jews? And he answering said unto him, Thou sayest it.

3 And [d]the chief priests accused him of many things; [e]but he answered nothing.

4 And Pilate asked him again, saying, [f]Answerest thou nothing? behold how many things they witness against thee.

5 But Jesus yet answered nothing; so that [g]Pilate marvelled.

6 ¶ Now [h]at that feast he released unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they desired.

7 And [i]there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection.

8 And the multitude, crying aloud, began to desire him to do as he had ever done unto them.

9 But Pilate answered them, saying, [k]Will ye that I release unto you the King of the Jews?

10 For he knew that the chief priests had delivered him [l]for envy.

11 But [m]the chief priests moved the people, that he should rather release Barabbas unto them.

12 And Pilate answered and said again unto them, [n]What will ye then that I shall do unto him [o]whom ye call the King of the Jews?

13 And they cried out again, Crucify him.

14 Then Pilate said unto them, [p]Why, what evil hath he done? [q]And they cried out the more exceedingly, Crucify him.

15 And so Pilate, [r]willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, [s]when he had scourged him, to be crucified.

16 And [t]the soldiers led him away into the hall called [u]Pretorium; and they call together the whole band.

17 And [x]they clothed him with purple, and platted a crown of thorns, and put it about his head;

18 And began to salute him, [y]Hail, King of the Jews!

19 And [z]they smote him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon him, [a]and bowing their knees worshipped him.

20 And when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own clothes on him, [b]and led him out to crucify him.

21 And [c]they compel one Simon, [d]a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander [e]and Rufus, [f]to bear his cross.

22 And they bring him unto the place [g]Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull.

23 And [h]they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: [i]but he received it not.

24 And when they had [k]crucified him, [l]they parted his garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take.

pattern of meekness, patience, fortitude, holiness, and compassion to sinners, that the earth or even the creation at large ever witnessed: we here perceive likewise the desert of sin, the worth of our souls, the foundation of our hope, and the nature of our Christian calling; which is to do good with unwearied perseverance, and to endure evil with fortitude, meekness, and patience, after the example of our gracious Saviour. (Note, and P. O. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) Thus may we look forward with comfort to the time, when we "shall see the Son of man, sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven;" and hope to be numbered with his victorious army of glorified saints; when all his persecutors and enemies will be driven away into everlasting destruction. But when we hear Peter, after all his promises and resolutions, repeatedly denying his Lord with oaths and curses; we may well tremble to reflect on the weakness and depravity even of believers, if left to themselves; we may take occasion from the reflection to admire the mercy and patience of our God; we may be excited to thankfulness, that we have not yet been left utterly to forsake him; and we may confess with shame our manifold instances of partial unfaithfulness. Finally, "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall:" and let him that has fallen think of these things, and of his own offences, and return to the Lord with weeping and supplication, with deep repentance, and lively faith; still hoping to receive forgiveness, to be restored to "the joy of God's salvation," and to be henceforth established by his free Spirit. Besides the notoriously bad character of Barabbas, as a robber, he had been guilty of the very crime, of which the scribes and priests falsely accused Jesus; having joined in or headed an insurrection against the Romans, which had committed murder in the attempt. Yet this man was preferred decidedly before the holy and beneficent Saviour! though the public demand, that a criminal of this kind should be released, might have given great offence to Pilate, had he not perceived the envy and malice by which the priests and rulers were actuated.

27 And [p]with him they crucify two thieves, the one on his right hand, and the other on his left.

28 And [q]the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And he was numbered with the transgressors.

29 ¶ And [r]they that passed by railed on him, wagging their heads, and saying, [s]Ah, thou that destroyest the temple and buildest it in three days, 30 Save thyself, and come down from the cross.

31 Likewise [t]also the chief priests, mocking, said among themselves with the scribes, [u]He saved others, himself he cannot save.

32 Let [x]Christ, the King of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe. [y]And they that were crucified with him reviled him.

33 ¶ And [z]when the sixth hour was come, there was [a]darkness over the whole land until the ninth hour.

34 And [b]at the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, [c]Eloi, Eloi, lama sabacthani? which is, being interpreted, My God, my God, [d]why hast thou forsaken me?

35 And some of them that stood by when they heard it, said, Behold, [e]he calleth Elias.

36 And one ran, [f]and filled a sponge full of vinegar, and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink, saying, Let alone: let us see whether Elias will come to take him down.

their proceedings, to have gone through so much business, and to have surmounted so many difficulties, by that hour. Indeed in John's gospel, we read of "the sixth hour;" but this is generally allowed either to be an error of the transcribers, or to admit of another interpretation; and Christ is commonly supposed to have been nailed to the cross about nine o'clock in the forenoon. (Note, John 19:13—18, v. 14.)—' The darkness began at the sixth hour, which yet began not till after our Lord had hung on the cross some considerable time; till after the soldiers had divided the garments, the Jews had mocked him, and bid him come down from the cross; and the discourse had passed between the two thieves among themselves, and between the repenting thief and our Lord.' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 27:45. Luke 23:39—43.)

V. 33. (Marg. Ref. Note, Matt. 27:45.) 'The anger of God, as avenging our sins on our Surety, was attested by this horror of darkness. ... It is inquired by many, whether this is to be understood of the land of Judea, or of the whole earth. Tertullian seems to embrace the latter opinion, calling the failure of the sun the misfortune of the world, which they had recorded in the Roman archives. But I rather agree with those who understand it of Jerusalem, and all the neighbouring country: for it would be more proper for the prodigy to be noted in the archives, if peculiar to Judea. ... While the sun enlightened the rest of the earth, and even at the noonday, this one corner of the world, in which so horrible a crime was perpetrating, was covered with the thickest darkness! ... This miracle may seem to have been opposed to one directly contrary; when darkness covered the Egyptians, while the sun shone on the Israelites in Goshen. At that time verily, God intimated that destruction impended over the Egyptians; and that liberty was obtained for his people: but now, on the contrary, he showed that, while miserable blindness was coming on the Jews, (with which they are punished even to the present time,) the heavenly light of the gospel would arise on all other nations.' Beza. (Notes, Ex. 10:21—23. P. O. 12—29.)

V. 34—39. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Matt. 27:46—49,51—54 John 19:25—30.) 'Christ, striving mightily with Satan, with sin, and with death, all arme l with the dreadful curse of God; his body hanging on the cross, oppressed with exquisite tortures, and his soul sinking in the depths of hell, cries out with a loud voice: and though he had received a wound from death, as being for a time deprived of life; yet by smiting both things above and things beneath, by rending the veil of the temple, and extorting a testimony in his favour from his executioners, declares to his enemies, who still remained obstinate and mocked him, that he was speedily about to show himself a Conqueror, and the Lord of all.' Beza.—It has been supposed, that the vigour with which Jesus cried out just before he expired, being contrary to what is generally observed in such cases, (Note, Mait. 27:50.) helped to convince the centurion that he was "the Son of God:" but the confidence, with which, in those circumstances, he openly addressed God as his Father, and committed his soul into his hands, seems to have had still greater influence in producing this conviction. But Matthew uses the word κουστωδια, (Matt. 27:66. 28:11.) custodia, which is as entirely Latin κεντυριων.—This man was the Son of God. (39) Ὁυτος υιος Θεου. Because the article is wanting before each of th nouns, some would render the clause, 'A son of a god.' (S on Matt. 27:40,54.) For saying, "I am the Son of God," Jesus had been crucified; but the centurion says, "Truly he was the Son of God;" in that sense most clearly, in which Jesus had said that he was; and for saying it had been crucified.—His views doubtless were very indistinct on the subject, and so were those of the Jews, and even of the apostles. CHAPTER XVI.

An angel informs the women that Jesus is risen, 1—8. He appears to Mary Magdalene, 9—11; to two disciples going into the country, 12, 13; and to the eleven; whom he upbraids for their unbelief, and commissions to preach the gospel to all the world, 14—18. He ascends into heaven, 19. The gospel is every where preached, and confirmed by miracles, 20.

AND [a]when the sabbath was past, [b]Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought [c]sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him.

2 And [d]very early in the morning, the first day of the week, they came unto the sepulchre at the rising of the sun.

3 And they said among themselves, [e]Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?

4 And when they looked, [f]they saw that the stone was rolled away: for it was very great.

5 And [g]entering into the sepulchre, they saw [h]a young man sitting on the right side, clothed in a long white garment; [i]and they were affrighted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—26. The sufferings of our meek and holy Redeemer are an inexhaustible source of instruction to the lively believer; and a subject of which, in his best hours, he cannot be weary. The consideration, that no one was ever so universally hated, or so cruelly and contemptuously treated, by men of every rank, profession, or religion, (his own disciples alone excepted,) as the only perfectly wise, holy, and excellent person, who has appeared on earth; leads the serious mind into such views of human depravity and enmity to God, as, being applied to himself, by recollecting that such are we all by nature, tends exceedingly to humiliation before God: while a view of his stupendous love, in delivering up his well-beloved Son to this ignominious and cruel death; not sparing him, but making his soul a sacrifice for the sins of such daring rebels and enemies, must cause the broken heart to overflow with admiration and grateful joy. To believe, that such an atonement was absolutely necessary, in order that a God of infinite mercy might honourably pardon sin, and save sinners, cannot fail to give the mind the deepest impression of his justice and holiness, the excellency of the law which was thus magnified, and the evil of sin which was thus expiated: and it must at the same time destroy all expectations of being saved in any other way; for, "if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died in vain." The contemplation of the whole human species, however otherwise distinguished, all lying under deserved condemnation, and exposed to everlasting misery; except as Jesus thus opened the gate of life and salvation to believers, must fill our minds with compassionate concern for all around us, and lead us to look upon the most prosperous sinners, with a mixture of solemn awe and tender commiseration: at the same time it directly tends to crucify us to the world; to reconcile us to its scorn and hatred; to mortify us to its friendship, interests, honours, and pleasures, to heal the diseases of our souls, which break forth in envy and eager competition; and to render us contented in poverty and obscurity. (Note, Gal. 6:11—14.)—But with what earnestness will the man who firmly believes these truths, seek an interest in this great salvation! With what ardent gratitude will he receive the comfortable assurance, or even the dawning hope, of forgiveness and eternal life, as purchased for him by the sufferings and death of the incarnate Son of God! And with what "godly sorrow" will he mourn over those sins, which he now looks on as having "crucified the Lord of glory!" Hence that attention to this "one thing needful," which subordinates all other interests and employments: hence that devoted obedience to Christ, which neither danger nor suffering can move: hence that abhorrence of sin, which renders its indwelling, and occasional prevalency, the great burden and deepest distress of a believer's life; and which induces him to the diligent use of every means which tends to weaken and destroy all evil out of his heart: hence that endeared affection to all those who love and resemble Christ; that desire to recommend him to all around; and that delight in speaking, hearing, or reading of him, and his love and suffering for sinners: and hence that love to enemies, that patience under afflictions, and that meekness under injuries and provocations, which distinguish the character of consistent Christians from that of all other men. The same views of Christ crucified, gradually reconcile the believer to the thoughts of death; in order that he may behold, love, and praise as he ought, that dear Saviour, who was wounded and pierced to save him from the wrath to come.—Let us then frequently meditate on the interesting scenes, which have so blessed an efficacy in producing these holy and benevolent affections, and in forming our character into a conformity to Jesus, and a meetness for heaven: and let us especially adopt this method, when we are tempted to impatience under trials, or peevishness under contempt and reproach; or when we grow anxious or discontented about worldly things, or are disposed to hanker after sinful indulgences. (P. O. Matt. 27:11—44. Luke 23:1—31. John 19:17—30.)

V. 27—47. Careful meditation on the silence, meekness, and patience of the holy Jesus, amidst all his complicated sufferings, and the varied contempt and cruelty of his numerous enemies, must cause us to exclaim, 'Did Jesus thus suffer, and shall I, a wretched sinner, fret or repine? shall I indulge resentment, or utter reproaches and menaces, because of troubles and injuries?' With this object before us, surely we cannot think it too much to pour out tears for those sins, for which the Son of God shed his precious blood; or to pour out our prayers for those blessings, for which "he poured out his soul unto death, and was numbered with malfactors;" or to bear hardship for him who bore the wrath of God for us. Indeed all we can suffer must be light, compared with his unknown agonies: yet how often are we "weary and faint in our minds;" instead of being thankful that we are not in the pit of destruction, as we justly might have been! But did we more constantly contemplate these scenes, we should not only derive peace and comfort from the Saviour's atoning blood; but we should also transcribe his character into our lives, and learn more and more to dread and hate all those evil dispositions, which marked the conduct of his persecutors: and we should always find arguments, encouragements, and motives, to live to the glory of "him who died for us and rose again." We also ought to remember, that the hiding of God's face from us is in itself more dreadful than all that man can do unto us; that we may learn to cry earnestly to him for help and comfort, when insulted and contemned by men. He will not forsake those who trust and call upon him: death, now deprived of his sting, will soon terminate the believer's sorrows, as it did the Saviour's; then the way into the holiest will be open to his soul, as it was before to his prayers, and he will be out of the reach of all enemies. His dying words and behaviour may leave a salutary impression on the minds of those who observe them; his memory may perhaps be honoured by those who despised him when living; the grave will be a quiet and sacred repository to his body, till the joyful resurrection; and thus he will be made "more than conqueror, through him who loved him," and "washed him from his sins in his own blood."—Lord, visit our souls with this salvation, and make us thankful for these thine inestimable gifts! (P. O. Matt. 27:45—56.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1—4. Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 28:1—8, v. 1.—Had bought. (1) That is, the evening before the sabbath. (Notes, Luke 23:50—56, vv. 55,56. 24:1—9.) But some think, that the women bought more spices when the sabbath was ended, that is, after sunset.—Very early. (2) 'They began their journey to see the sepulchre, while it was only twilight, . . . and they came to the sepulchre, . . . as the sun began to rise.' Whitby (Notes, John 20:1—10,18.)—They said, &c. (3) The women had seen where the body of Jesus was laid, and the very large stone placed at the opening of the sepulchre: (15:46,47.) and this was a difficulty which they knew not how to remove; yet they proceeded, in hope of finding some to help them to roll away the stone. Had they known of the guard of Roman soldiers, their trial would have been still greater.

V. 5—8. (Notes, Luke 24:1—12.) St. Luke mentions two angels, whom the women saw on this occasion; but Matthew and Mark take notice only of the one who spake to them, and whom they probably saw first.—The angel appeared like a man, in the vigour of youth: and "clothed in a long white garment," the emblem of purity and innocence: but his appearance to the soldiers seems to have been far more

6 And he saith unto them, [k]Be not affrighted: Ye seek [m]Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified: [n]he is risen, he is not here: behold the place where they [l]laid him.

7 But go your way, [o]tell his disciples and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee: [p]there shall ye see him, as he said unto you.

8 And [q]they went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; [r]for they trembled and were amazed: [s]neither said they any thing to any man: for they were afraid.

9 Now when Jesus was risen early, [t]the first day of the week, [u]he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, [x]out of whom he had cast seven devils.

10 And she went and told them that had been with him, [y]as they mourned and wept.

11 And they, when they had heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, [z]believed not.

12 ¶ After that, [a]he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country.

13 And [b]they went and told it unto the residue: [c]neither believed they them.

14 ¶ Afterward [d]he appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, [e]and upbraided them with their [f]unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen him after he was risen.

15 And he said unto them, [g]Go ye [h]into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.

16 He [i]that believeth and [k]is baptized shall be saved; [l]but he that believeth not shall be damned.

majestic and awful; yet the women were affrighted, being aware that he was more than man.—In encouraging and directing them, he especially mentioned Peter, who might otherwise have deemed himself cast off for his grievous offence in denying his Master. In the subsequent conduct of the women, their amazement and terror are noticed, and not their joy. The former first seized them; but the latter afterwards prevailed. V. 9—11. (Marg. Ref. Note, John 20:11—17.) It is here said, that Jesus had cast out of Mary Magdalene "seven devils," or demons. (Luke 8:2.) This no doubt refers to a real possession, from which she had mercifully been delivered, in the same manner as the man was who had the legion: but whether this had been a visitation appointed her, for the sins of her former life, or not, is quite uncertain. (Note, 5:2—13.) Indeed all that is generally taken for granted, of her previous bad character and profligate conduct, rests merely on the credit of tradition, which reports that she was "the woman who was a sinner," of whom St. Luke speaks; (Notes, Luke 7:36—50.) for there is no scriptural proof of it, though very much has frequently been built on it. Her surname of Magdalene, seems to relate to the place of her nativity, or abode: for the words translated Mary Magdalene, or "Mary the Magdalene," (Μαρια ἡ Μαγδαληνη,) may very properly be rendered "Mary of Magdala," as "Jesus the Nazarene" is commonly rendered "Jesus of Nazareth."—The mourning of the apostles, and their not believing Mary's report, show how little they had regarded our Lord's repeated predictions of his resurrection, and how far they were from expecting that event. This must have occurred before the return of the other women from the sepulchre: for Jesus appeared to them also by the way. (Note, Matt. 28:9,10.)

V. 12, 13. (Notes, Luke 24:13—35.) Our Lord was pleased to change his habit or appearance on this occasion, that the disciples might not for a time know who he was.—Neither believed, &c. (13) That is, several of the disciples did not fully credit them; though others had been before convinced of Christ's resurrection. But in so extraordinary an event, and among a number of persons, we need not wonder, that some were more deeply impressed by what they heard than others. 'Hence one of the ancients says well, their doubting is the confirmation of our faith: and the more difficulty they showed in believing Christ's resurrection, the greater reason have we to believe it. For the testimony of them who believed not themselves, till after unquestionable conviction, is the more credible on that account.' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 28:16,17. 1 Cor. 15:3—11.)

V. 14—16. (Notes, Matt. 28:18. Luke 24:36—49. John 20:19—29. 21:1—23.) If we understand this of our Lord's appearing to the apostles, on the evening of the day on which he arose, Thomas was not present: but they might be called the eleven, that being the whole remaining number, though one of them was absent: or some other appearance of our Lord to them might be intended. At this time, Jesus sharply rebuked them, yea, upbraided them, for their unbelief and hardness of heart. (Notes, 8:17—21. Matt. 11:20—24. Luke 24:25—31, v. 25. Jam. 1:5—8.) Their ambition, and carnal prejudices and expectations, had closed their minds, so that they did not suitably attend to our Lord's predictions of his death, resurrection, and spiritual kingdom; and therefore they were most unreasonably backward to believe the report of those who had seen him after his resurrection.—He however renewed his choice of them as his apostles, and commissioned them to "go into all the world, to preach his gospel to every creature." (Note, John 20:19—23.) Though they did not, at this time, understand the full import of these words; yet they certainly contained an express commission to preach his salvation and kingdom to all the nations of the earth, and to men of every description and character, as far as they were able and they imply a command to the same effect, to all their successors in the sacred ministry, as far as it is in their power; and to all Christians to aid them according to their several abilities and situations. (Notes, Rom. 10:12—17. Col. 1:21—23. 1 Thes. 2:13—16. 3 John 5—8.) They were authorized and commanded to propose the blessings of the gospel indiscriminately to all men, as far as they had access to them; inviting them to believe in Christ, and calling them to submit to his authority, as the subjects of his mediatorial kingdom. These things they were instructed to enforce in the name and stead of Christ, their Lord, by assuring all "who believed and were baptized," that they should "be saved," that is, with eternal salvation; and by declaring the final and dreadful condemnation of all unbelievers, whatever their character in other respects might be. Doubtless we must understand this solemn declaration, of that true faith which receives Christ in all his characters and offices, and for all the purposes of salvation, and which produces a proper effect upon the heart and life; and not of a mere assent, a dead faith, which cannot profit. Baptism is the outward sign of regeneration, and it is also that profession of faith in Christ, which is required of all who embrace Christianity. (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. Acts 2:37—40. Rom. 10:5—11. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) But if men truly believe in Christ, profess openly faith in him, and partake of his sanctifying Spirit, they will doubtless be saved: even should they have no opportunity of being baptized with water, or should they fall into any mistake about the external mode of administering that ordinance: and if men both believe and are baptized, it does not follow from the order of the words in the text, that the baptism is invalid because it was previous to believing; for no set of Christians rebaptize those who have been baptized in their own way, because it afterwards appears that they were not true believers at the time, though it be hoped that they have since become so. On the other hand, unbelievers must be condemned: for they remain under the sentence of the holy law which they have broken; and they are also guilty of neglecting the salvation of the gospel, and of despising all the divine perfections displayed in it, from pride of heart, self-will, enmity to God, and love of sin and the world. (Notes, John 3:19—21 27—36, vv. 35,36. 1 John 5:9—13.)—'They who hence conclude that infants are not capable of baptism, must also hence conclude that they cannot be saved: faith being more expressly required to salvation than to baptism.... In the second clause baptism is omitted; because it is not simply the want of baptism, but the contemptuous neglect of it, that makes men guilty of damnation; otherwise infants might be damned for the mistakes or the profaneness of their parents. Whitby. (Notes, John 3:3—8.)—The words, perhaps, may more correctly be rendered, "He that shall believe and be baptized," &c.—It is the aorist, or indefinite participle: but it

V. 17, 18. The Lord Jesus was about to be removed from his apostles, and they were sent forth into the world to preach his gospel in the face of opposition and persecution: but to encourage them in this arduous and perilous undertaking, he assured them of extraordinary miraculous powers and protection. And not only so, but that when any believed on him through their word, they also would be endued with power from on high; enabling them to cast out devils, to speak with tongues, and to take up serpents without being injured by them. And, at times when the art of poisoning was almost cultivated as a science, and it might be expected that their enemies would endeavour in this way to destroy them; they were also assured, that "if they drank any deadly thing, it should not hurt them:" and that they should be enabled to heal the sick, by laying on of hands, both for the comfort of their friends, and to demonstrate the truth of their doctrine. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Acts 2:4—11. 10:44—48. 19:5—20. 28: 3—6.) It is not said that all who ever should believe, would be enabled to work miracles; or that none, except those who had saving faith, would perform them: (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) but that "these signs would follow them that believed," that is, would be manifestly displayed among them.

Wherever they went, the Lord, their risen, ascended, and exalted Saviour, "wrought with them;" both by the power of his Spirit upon the hearts of the people, and by "confirming their words with signs following." The addition of the word "Amen," may denote the Evangelist's earnest desire, that the same powerful and gracious presence of Christ, and the same success, might still attend the preaching of the gospel in every place. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. When we deny ourselves, and voluntarily incur trouble and expense, from love to Christ and zeal for his glory, we shall be accepted, even though our endeavours should prove unsuccessful: and when we proceed in the path of duty, as far as we can; those difficulties, which we were ready to look upon as insurmountable, will often be removed by means, of which we had no expectation.—Those whose hearts are right before God, may yet be greatly mistaken in their judgment and purposes; and they will be often disquieted, when they have abundant reason to rejoice. Indeed, those who believe, love, and seek "Jesus, who was crucified and is risen," should not in any possible circumstances give way to disconsolate sorrow, or gloomy fears. Evil men and apostate angels cannot hurt them: and holy angels are their faithful friends, and delight to minister to their comfort, because they are the objects of the Lord's peculiar love and favour. Even after they have been overcome by temptation, and have acted inconsistently, yea very basely; yet when they are contrite and deeply penitent, the gracious Saviour will mingle encouragement with their humiliation, lest they "should be swallowed up of over-much sorrow;" and a trembling Peter shall be especially mentioned, that he may not be tempted to despondency. But alas! how slowly do we admit the consolations, which the word of God holds forth to us! and how difficult is it to believe, that the Lord will specially favour those, over whom Satan has heretofore peculiarly domineered! Yet he sometimes employs such trophies of his victory over the powers of darkness, to bear tidings of his complete salvation and abundant grace to those who mourn and weep; that the very example of the messenger may evince the truth of the message; and prove that Jesus lives, and "is able to save to the uttermost all them that come to God through him." (P. O. Matt. 28:1—10. Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.)

V. 12—20. In whatever way the Lord is pleased to confirm his truth, our faith is apt to be weak and wavering: and therefore, while he comforts his people, by "manifesting himself to them as he doth not to the world," he often sees it needful to rebuke and correct them for "their hardness of heart," in distrusting his faithful promises, as well as in not obeying his holy precepts. Yet he will "heal the backslidings" of his people, and "love them freely," and again employ them in his service.—The commission, given by Christ to his ministers, extends to "every creature," throughout the world; so that wherever a human being is found, we are expressly commanded to propose to him the gospel of Christ, whatever reception he may give it. Our instructions likewise, as preachers of the gospel, contain not only truths, promises, encouragements, and precepts, but also most awful warnings and sanctions: so that we as much preach the gospel, when we declare in the name of God, that "he who believeth not shall be damned," as when we proclaim, that "whosoever believeth" in Jesus "shall be saved." However men may now despise, or dispute against, such solemn denunciations, or deride and revile those who insist on them; they will doubtless be fulfilled in their most tremendous meaning, upon all who hear and reject the gospel. We indeed do not now profess to work miracles in confirmation of our instructions: but the Scriptures are irrefragably proved to be of divine original; and this will render all those inexcusable who despise or neglect them. The effects also produced, wherever the gospel is faithfully preached and truly believed, in changing the tempers, characters, and conversation of mankind, form a constant proof, that the gospel is "the power of God unto salvation:" (Notes, Rom. 1:13—16, v. 16. P. O. 16—21. 1 Cor. 1:20—25.) and indeed they who truly believe in Christ, will be defended against all the assaults of the serpent and his seed, and rendered more than conquerors over them; and be preserved from the fatal effects of those poisonous and dreadful heresies, which he is continually propagating in the world. (P. O. Matt. 28:11—20. Luke 24:36—53.) May then our ascended and glorified Redeemer send forth very many faithful ministers, every where to preach his gospel; and may he work with them and confirm his word "by signs following;" even "by opening men's eyes, and by turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among all that are sanctified, by faith in him." Amen.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. LUKE.

THIS evangelist was the companion of the apostle Paul, in all his labours and sufferings during many years, probably till he suffered martyrdom: (28:7—10. Col. 4:14. 2 Tim. 4:11. Philem. 24.—Notes, Acts 16:6—12, v. 10. 20:1—6. 27:1,2.) and, as he wrote "the Acts of the Apostles" also, which conclude with a brief account of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome; we may be sure, that he had the apostle's sanction to what he did; and we may infer with great probability, that this gospel was written some time before that event.—It certainly was extant at an early period, and was from the first received by the church as of divine authority (Introduction to the New Testament.)—It is not certainly known of what country St. Luke originally was, or when he was converted to Christianity. He never once mentions himself, except as he uses the first person plural, when writing several parts of St. Paul's history: and nothing is recorded of him, till we find him among the companions of that apostle: for Lucius of Cyrene seems to have been another person. (Acts 13:1.) Origen and Epiphanius say, that he was one of the seventy disciples: and in that case he must have been an eye-witness of many of the transactions which he records: yet he seems to say the contrary. (Note, 1:1—4.) The more general tradition however is, that he was a Syrian, and that he first became acquainted with Christianity at Antioch.—He is called by the apostle Paul, "the beloved physician;" and some report, that he had practised in this profession at Rome, having been taken thither for that purpose. It is known that the physicians, among the Romans, were generally the servants, or slaves, of the great men: and it is thought that, having been rewarded with his liberty, he received a name from his patron, as was often the case, and then, returning to Antioch in Syria, he became acquainted with St. Paul, embraced Christianity, was appointed to the ministry, and from that time attended the apostle in his travels. But Paul never calls him "his son," as he does Timothy and Titus: it is therefore probable that he was previously converted.—It is also uncertain whether he was a Jew by birth, a proselyte, or a Gentile convert. The language of St. Paul seems to favour the latter opinion: for, having mentioned several persons, who saluted the Colossians, he adds, "Who are of the circumcision. These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort to me." Yet he directly speaks in high terms of Epaphras, and calls "Luke, the beloved physician:" and as he could not mean to say, that these persons had not been a comfort to him, it seems to follow, that they were not of the circumcision. (Note, Col. 4:9—14.) It is indeed a general opinion, that none of the sacred books of the New Testament were written by Gentile converts, however eminent many of them were as preachers of the gospel. But the Scripture lays down no rule of that kind: it is probable that the book of Job was written by Elihu, who was not of the nation of Israel; (Preface to Job;) and certainly Nebuchadnezzar wrote the fourth chapter of Daniel. The sanction of the apostle, and the early and unanimous reception of St. Luke's writings, as divinely inspired, and a part of the canon of Scripture, are alone sufficient to satisfy any reasonable person: and it is remarkable, that in recording our Lord's words, when he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, he adds some particulars, not expressly mentioned in the other gospels, which, taken with the extraordinary accomplishment of them during above seventeen hundred years, form an internal demonstration, that he wrote "as he was moved by the Holy Ghost." (Note, 21:20—24.)—This gospel contains many parables, discourses, miracles, and events, which had been omitted by the preceding evangelists; and several, recorded by them, are here passed over. The history begins with the circumstances preceding and attending the birth of John the Baptist, and that of Jesus himself; and it closes with a fuller account of what passed between our Lord's resurrection and ascension, than Matthew or Mark had given.—St. Luke is supposed to have been a man of learning, previous to his being endued with spiritual gifts. His style is more pure and classical than that of the other evangelists; though not free from the Hebrew or Syriac idiom, which some make an objection to his being a Gentile convert: yet it only proves, that he had studied the Septuagint, and was conversant with Hellenists. The simplicity of the manner, however, in which he sets before the mind, as in a picture, the wonderful events which he records; and the talent which he manifests of fixing the attention and exciting the affections of his readers, by the most artless narrative; are so exquisite, that many have thought him, as a writer, capable of standing the competition with the most celebrated historians of Greece itself. (Note, 7:11—17.)

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1—4. Matthew and Mark are supposed to have written before Luke; but they could not be called "many:" and the former of them at least wrote from his personal knowledge, as well as under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; while the persons here mentioned had written from report. We must therefore understand the evangelist of some compilations, which have been lost very long since; for publishing and circulating authentic narratives, would soon discredit spurious ones: yet the persons who made them seem to have meant honestly, and those heretical gospels, which were propagated during the primitive times were not intended.—We hence learn, however, that several persons had undertaken to publish orderly narratives of those things which were "most surely believed" by Christians, or as 'most fully proved to them,' or 'most certainly performed among them;' for either the evidence by which they were attested, or the conviction which arose from the evidence of their having been accomplished, may be intended. These writers had collected their information from the testimony of those, who had "from the first been eye-witnessee" of the miracles, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, and who were ministers of the gospel to declare them unto others: the apostles seem especially intended. Most expositors suppose the second verse to point out the manner in which the evangelist had derived his information: yet it is directly connected with the first verse, and precedes the writer's first mention of himself. The histories referred to, however, had not been compiled with sufficient accuracy; and the evangelist was led to consider it as a service allotted him, to form a more exact and regular work of this kind: as he had accurately investigated the subject, and acquired a complete acquaintance with it, from the beginning of the gospel, in the conception and birth of John the Baptist; evidently by information and testimony, and not as an eye-witness.—This history he addressed to Theophilus, for his more full instruction in Christianity. Theophilus signifies, A lover of God: he appears to have been a person of rank and authority; for the title "Most excellent," is the same in the original, which is elsewhere addressed to the Roman governors. (Marg. Ref. t. Note, Acts 26:24—29, v. 25.) The title was given to Theophilus with greater propriety: but as St. Paul uses it to Festus, this fully proves, that Christianity does not forbid us to give this kind of customary honour to persons in authority, whatever their character or religion may be.—The word rendered "instructed," relates to the initiatory instruction in the first principles of Christianity, in which the converts were afterwards to be more fully taught and established.—[c] St. Luke thought not what was delivered by word of mouth only, even by the eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, sufficient to give Theophilus a knowledge of the certainty of these things, without writing the gospel. . . . very circumstance of the number of such narratives, at so early a period, is itself an evidence, that there was something in the first publication of the Christian doctrine, which ... excited the curiosity, and awakened the attention, of persons of all ranks and denominations; insomuch, that every narrative, which pretended to furnish men with additional information, concerning so extraordinary a personage as Jesus, seems to have been read with avidity.' Campbell.

V. 5—7. Zacharias 'was not, as some have imagined, high-priest. ... Zacharias was chosen by lot to burn incense: the high-priest did it by the right of succession, and burned it in the Holy of holies, into which Zacharias entered not. ... Zacharias was priest of the course of Abia; whereas the high-priest was of no course at all. ... 'These several courses began on the sabbath-day, and continued to serve till the next sabbath.' Whitby. (Notes, 2 Kings 11:5—9. 1 Chr. 23:2—6. 24:10. Ezra 2:36—39.)—St. Luke begins his history with he parentage and birth of John. His father Zacharias was a priest of the order of Abia, or Abijah; (Marg. Ref. i.) and his wife Elisabeth also was descended from Aaron. They were exemplary persons, being "righteous before God," and not merely in the sight of men; (Marg. Ref. k—m.) being accepted as true believers, and approving themselves to him by a conscientious conduct in his sight: so that they habitually walked in an upright and regular course of obedience to all the moral commandments of the law, and in an attendance on all the ordinances of his instituted worship; and thus acted in a most blameless and irreproachable manner, as to the general tenor of their conduct. Doubtless they, as sinners, were justified and saved in the same way as others: but they were eminent examples of piety and integrity, and cordially concurred together in every part of the service of God. —They had no children: and as Elisabeth had been barren in her younger years, it was not to be expected that she should bear children in her old age. This was thought a very heavy affliction by the Jews: yet Zacharias gave no countenance to the practice of polygamy or divorce, by taking another wife. (Notes, Gen. 16:1—6.) The latter of these, especially, was common at that time: yet the pious Jews generally disapproved it. (Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:3—12.)

V. 8—10. 'The law required that the priest should burn incense morning and evening, upon the altar of incense, placed before the veil of the most holy place. (Ex. 30:6—8.) But because they who thus served in every course were many, it was necessary that they should by lot choose the man, who was to perform that service for that week; and so the Jews say they did.' Whitby.—According to the law and custom, Zacharias was employed to burn incense on the golden altar within the sanctuary; and at the same time a great number of people were collected without, in the courts of the temple, silently offering up their prayers and supplications. This was an apt and constant type of Christ's intercession in heaven; through which the prayers of believers, in every part of the outer court of the church on earth, ascend with acceptance before God. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Ex. 30:1—10. Rev. 8:1—6.)

V. 11—17. While Zacharias was officiating within the sanctuary, he was surprised by the appearance of an angel, probably in a splendid form, at the right hand of the altar of incense. This vision greatly alarmed him, though he was a man of approved piety: but the angel encouraged him not to be afraid, for he was come to assure him, that his prayers were heard and answered.—Zacharias and Elisabeth had doubtless often prayed for children; but it must be supposed, that they had for some time given up the hope of having any, and had submitted to the will of God, concluding that these prayers would not be answered. The angel's words, however, may refer to the prayers which Zacharias had then been offering up, in behalf of himself and his people, and for the coming of the promised Redeemer: or, in general, his prayers were accepted, and would all in due season be answered. As a proof of this, his wife Elisabeth, even in her old age, would bear him a son, whose name he should call John, the grace, (or favour) of the LORD: for he would be an honour and blessing to his father, a gracious answer to his prayers, and a pledge of the divine favour: so that he would have great joy and gladness in him; and many would rejoice at his birth, as anticipating the great usefulness of his future life. For, though he would be a plain man, and appear mean in his person and attire; yet he would be "great in the sight of the Lord," and according to his estimation of characters; being eminent for wisdom and piety, and a blessed instrument in glorifying him and doing good to men. As a token of his entire devotedness to God, he would be a perpetual Nazarite from his birth; (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Num. 6:1—21. Judg. 13:2—5, vv. 4,5.) and be likewise "filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb." Though "conceived in sin," like other men, yet a saving change would be wrought in his soul by the regenerating Spirit of God, even at or before his birth; which would appear in his eminent wisdom and piety from his earliest youth. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) In due time he would be brought forth, as a zealous preacher and a successful reformer, in converting many of the descendants of Israel, from their hypocrisy, impiety, or infidelity, to the true worship and service of the LORD their God: and he would go "before Him, in the spirit and power of Elijah," with intrepidity, zeal, sanctity, and a mind mortified to all earthly interests and pleasures, like that illustrious prophet. Thus he would turn the "hearts of the fathers with the children," or persons of every age and situation in society, to lay aside their party disputes or domestic contests, and to unite in repenting of their sins, and attending on the great duties of true religion. The disobedient and rebellious would thus be brought back to the wisdom of their righteous progenitors; or rather induced to attend to the wisdom of that Just One, who was coming among them: that they might become a people prepared, by humiliation and genuine repentance, to welcome in true faith the salvation, and become the subjects of the LORD, even of Jesus Christ. (Note, Mal. 4:4—6.)—John went before Christ, as his forerunner, to prepare the people for him; yet THE LORD THEIR GOD is the antecedent to the pronoun "Him,"—"Shall he turn to the Lord their God; and he shall go before him, &c." so that the angel's address was evidently calculated to induce the belief, that Christ was the Lord God of Israel; and must have been improper, and suited to mislead us, on any other supposition. (Marg. Ref. h—o. Notes, 76—79. 3:4—6. Is. 40:3—5. Mal. 3:1—4. John 1:30—34. 3:27—36, vv. 28,29.)—Dr. Campbell renders the clause, "he shall go before them;" without the least intimation in the notes of any different reading, or even conjectural alteration. —'John, in Hebrew, Johanan, which occurs nearly thirty times in the Old Testament, is derived from JEHOVAH and Chen, and properly signifies the grace and favour of the LORD.' Doddridge.

V. 18—20. (Notes, 34—38. Gen. 17:17,18. 18:9—12.) When the angel had delivered this gracious message, Zacharias, reflecting upon the great improbability of having a son by his wife in their old age, and not duly considering the power of God, "staggered at the promise through unbelief." (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, Rom. 4:18—22.) He therefore required some further sign, by which he might know that this would be performed: whereas the very appearance of the angel, whose presence had so alarmed him, was a sufficient sign that the promise sent by him would be accomplished. The angel therefore informed him, that he was Gabriel, who stood before God, and ministered unto him, and of whom he must have read in the prophecy of Daniel; (Dan. 8:16. 9:21.) and that he was sent from heaven on purpose to declare to him these glad tidings. But, as he had doubted the truth of his words, and had demanded a sign in confirmation of them, notwithstanding so many eminent persons had been born of parents, who had long been childless, as Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samson, and Samuel; a sign would be given him, which would at the same time be a rebuke of his unbelief: for he would thenceforth be no more able to speak, till the promise had received its accomplishment; (Note, 21—25.) yet that would certainly take place in its appointed season. (Marg. Ref. r—x.)

V 21—25. The interview between the angel and Zacharias, as above related, would not take up much time; but the mind of Zacharias must have been occupied and agitated by a variety of reflections and emotions; so that he continued in the temple, some time after the angel had left him, perhaps employed in devotion. In the mean while the people waited for him, probably to dismiss them with the customary blessing, (Notes, Num. 6:23—26.) being surprised on what account he continued in the temple beyond the usual time. But when he came out he was unable to speak to them; and they perceived by his signs "that he had seen a vision." Thus he remained speechless, or deaf and dumb, for this was doubtless the case with him. (61—63.) He was, however, able to burn incense according to his office; and he continued at the temple, till the time of his appointed ministration was expired, when he returned to his own house: and soon after Elisabeth finding herself pregnant, "hid herself five months." She kept at home and much alone, either that she might be preserved from contracting any ceremonial defilement, as the child to be born of her was to be a perpetual Nazarite; or that she might not seem to be lifted up with the favour conferred on her; or rather, that she might have the more leisure for meditation, prayer, and thanksgiving, on this extraordinary occasion. For she observed, as in admiration, that, "thus," in so unexpected a way of grace and favour, "the Lord had dealt with her," at the time when he was pleased to take away the reproach of barrenness, under which she had hitherto lain among her neighbours and acquaintance; (Notes, Judg. 11:34—40. Is. 4:1.) in that he had promised to make her, in a marvellous way, the mother of a son, of whom so great things had been spoken.—Doubtless, Zacharias had by writing made known to her the purport of the angel's message. The time of her close retirement continued five months, for in the sixth month Mary went to visit her: yet it is probable, she lived much at home and in retirement during the whole of her pregnancy.

V. 26—33. The Evangelist next proceeds to relate the miraculous conception of Jesus. In the sixth month of Elisabeth's pregnancy, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth, to the Virgin Mary, whose espousals to Joseph have already been considered. (Notes, Matt. 1:18—25.)—It is remarkable that the name "Elisabeth" was the same with Elisheba, the wife of Aaron; and that of "Mary," the same with that of Miriam his sister. (Ex. 6:23. 15:20,21.) —When the angel came to Mary in her retirement, (probably in a glorious form,) he addressed her by saying, "Hail, thou that art highly favoured of the Lord, &c." That is, 'Rejoice on account of the honour intended thee, and on which I now congratulate thee; for thou art highly favoured of God, not only as an accepted believer, but as the mother of the long-expected Messiah: "the Lord is with thee," therefore, in a special manner, and in this repect, thou art happy above other women, and distinguished from them all. (Marg. and Ref.) The Papists have unaccountably turned this salutation of the angel into an act of adoration; for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

34 Then said Mary unto the angel, [y] How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?

35 And the angel answered and said unto her, [z] The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also [a] that holy thing, which shall be born of thee, shall be called [b] The Son of God.

37 For [d] with God nothing shall be impossible.

and the word for "highly favoured," having been rendered in the Vulgate "full of grace," they have thus addressed the Virgin Mary with idolatrous worship, and very great numbers do so to this day: nay, this act of devotion, such as it is, often precludes the use of the Lord's prayer, or of any other prayer to God, or at least is far more frequently repeated than any other! But there is no expression in this address, but what might properly be used by a superior to an inferior, in Mary's situation; and doubtless it was thus intended; for a greater absurdity can scarcely be devised, than to suppose that the angel Gabriel came down from heaven, to worship a poor sinful mortal here on earth, as Mary well knew herself to be!—This extraordinary appearance and salutation, however, disquieted her mind: she was not only alarmed at the angel's presence; but was greatly perplexed about the meaning and consequences of so uncommon an address. But the angel calmed her fears, and assured her, that she had "found favour with God," and would shortly conceive and bear a Son, whom she was directed to call JESUS. He would be great, above all whoever appeared on earth, being called, and acknowledged to be, "the Son of the Highest;" as being one in nature and perfection with the "Lord God" who would in due time exalt him, in his mediatorial character, to the throne of David, his father as to his human nature; and on that throne he would reign "over the house of Jacob," and over the true Israel of God, not only for a few years, as David and his successors had done, but for ever; so that "of his kingdom there should be no end." V. 34—38. "How shall this be?" is very different from "Whereby shall I know this?" (18) The latter implies a doubt of the truth of the prediction; the former merely asks direction. Mary's question seems entirely the language of faith and humble admiration. She probably meant to inquire, what her conduct ought to be respecting her espousals with Joseph, and in other respects. (Note, Judg. 13:8.) She seems to have understood it, as implying that she was to conceive miraculously; but she desired further information: she, however, asked no sign for the confirmation of her faith, as Zacharias had done. The angel therefore, in replying, merely told her that she would conceive by the Holy Spirit descending upon her: in this manner "the power of the most High would overshadow her;" and the Infant would be formed in her womb by his creating energy, and under his special protection. Thus the promised Seed would properly be "made of a woman," and partaker of human nature, without the pollution of sin, which is common to all others descended from fallen Adam. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Job. 14:1—6, v. 4. Is. 7:14. Jer. 31:21,22. Gal. 4:4—7.) This child might therefore be called that holy thing," or holy child: and even in respect of his human nature, he should be acknowledged to be "the Son of God;" as well as in his divine nature, and his mysterious Person as "God manifest in the flesh."—The Man, Christ Jesus, being called "the Son of God," because conceived by the operation of the Holy Spirit, is a full proof of the Deity of that sacred Agent.—In order more fully to establish Mary in her believing expectation of this great event, the angel informed her, that Elisabeth had conceived a son in her old age; and was at that time in the sixth month of her pregnancy, though she had long been deemed barren! Elisabeth was cousin to Mary, by the mother's side, though a daughter of Aaron in the father's line: for the families of David and Aaron frequently intermarried; and this affinity shadowed forth the union of the kingly and priestly office, in the person of the Messiah.—Mary's conception in virginity was more evidently miraculous than Elisabeth's in her old age; but nothing was, or could be, impossible to the power of God. (Note, Gen. 18:13—15.)—When Mary heard this, she did not at all waver in her belief of what the angel had told her: and though she could not but fear, that her pregnancy might expose her to many suspicions, or injurious reflections, and painful trials, and indeed to very great danger: she humbly and implicitly resigned herself to the divine will, saying, 'Behold here I am, the handmaid and servant of the Lord; let it be to me according to thy word.' Probably, the miraculous conception immediately took place; and the angel having executed his commission departed from her. (Marg. Ref. a, b, d, e.)
